Each terminal will have two wings: an Israeli wing for residents of Israel and visitors to the country, and a Palestinian wing — complete with flag — for residents of the West Bank and Gaza Strip and visitors to those areas.

Ultimate authority for running the Allenby and Rafiah border crossings will remain in Israeli hands, with an Israeli director-general responsible for the entire terminal including the Palestinian wing. Palestinian officials will conduct searches only on Palestinians and other Arab travellers; they will have no jurisdiction over or contact with Israeli travelers. In contrast, Israeli Port Authority officials will have the right to inspect any suspicious visitors and prevent their entry. Israel will also maintain responsibility for overall security at the terminals.

But the Israeli presence will be downplayed. The agreement calls for tinted glass, "indirect and invisible Israeli checking" and other mechanisms aimed at "maintaining the dignity of persons passing through the border crossings."

"We want to limited to a minimum the amount of friction between Israeli authorities and Arab travellers," explains Kessar.

To that end, the Transport Ministry is introducing automated equipment. The installation of conveyer belts, X-ray equipment and other modern airport technology will reduce direct contact between Israeli authorities and Arab travellers. And it will of course enable officials to process visitors more quickly and efficiently. This is no small consideration for Israeli authorities who are expecting over 1.2 million people to pass through the Allenby Bridge this year (compared to 840,000 in 1993) — an all-time peak in traffic, a trend that is expected to continue.

Until now, Palestinian residents of the West Bank and Gaza Strip have comprised the vast majority of people using the bridge. They cross the border to visit relatives, conduct business or make a pilgrimage to Mecca. There are also a small number of citizens of Arab countries, particularly Jordan, who have special permits to visit the West Bank, and a few pilgrims and other tourists.

The Palestinians will be the ones most affected by the impact of the changes to the border crossings. But the new system is also being implemented in anticipation of eventual peace treaties with Jordan, Syria and Lebanon, according to Kessar.

"Until recently, Israel did not pay much attention to land borders as ports of entry. The vast majority of visitors to Israel fly here. But now the situation is changing and we must bring our land border crossings up to standard," said Kessar.

As another sign of the times, the transport minister indicated that Jordan has expressed interest in building a road from Aquaba to Egypt, and in charting Jordanian passenger flights to Europe over Israeli territory. Kessar said that Israel would consider agreeing to both these proposals if the Jordanians submitted a formal request.

Jericho police refuse to accept prisoners

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Palestinian police in the autonomous area of Jericho in the West Bank refused last week to accept 220 Palestinians released from Israeli prisons.

The prisoners, all of whom were residents of the territories still administered by Israel, had agreed to remain within the borders of Jericho until the end of their prison terms, an Israeli request justified under the terms of the agreement signed last month in Cairo for implementing Palestinian self-rule.

Israel Defence Force sources denied a claim by Palestinian security chief Jibril Rajoub that the prisoners had refused to sign a declaration that they would refrain from taking up arms against the peace process.

According to IDF sources, the prisoners had signed the declaration, but Palestinian authorities in Jericho refused to accept them, claiming the area was already overcrowded.

In Gaza, meanwhile, cries of joy and welcome greeted 389 Palestinians released from Israel's Ketziot prison in the Negev.

Most of those released were members of the Islamic fundamentalist Hamas movement and the Islamic Jihad, two groups militantly opposed to the Israeli-Palestinian peace initiative.

Under the terms of the May 4 Cairo agreement, Israel was to release 5,000 Palestinians held in Israeli jails within five weeks of the signing.

To date, some 4,000 prisoners have been freed.

Aristide meets with U.S. Jews

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — Exiled Haitian President Jean-Bertrand Aristide, speaking to an American Jewish group here late last month, compared the plight of Haitian refugees seeking haven in the United States today to that of European Jews seeking refuge during the 1930s.

He specifically recalled how in May 1939, some 900 Jews aboard the S.S. St. Louis tried desperately to escape the Holocaust, only to be turned away at every potential port of safety.

Aristide said that refugees who are returned to Haiti have faced violence and some have even been executed, adding to the over 5,000 people killed since the September 1991 coup in which he was ousted.

"The refugee crises will not end until democracy is restored to Haiti," Aristide said at the first Conscience of the Community Awards reception, sponsored by the Washington chapter of the American Jewish Congress.

"We must be just with our refugees. Given the escalating levels of violence and oppression, it would be immoral to ask people whose very lives are at risk to stay in Haiti," he said.

Although he welcomed the increased pressures and embargo put on Haiti's military government by the United Nations and United States, Aristide stressed the need for organized protests and pressure from the international community.

During World War II, he said, protests by Jewish groups helped push the world community to take action.

"This same solidarity is needed for Haiti. We are sure this will hasten the day when true democracy can be restored."

In ending his talk, Aristide, who speaks fluent Hebrew, said, "Traditionally, it is said: L'shanah haba'ah b'Yerushalayim (Next year in Jerusalem). Let us say tonight: L'shanah hazeh b'Haiti (This year in Haiti)."

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer FRED M. CATZMAN has been researching their origins over the past few years. Mr. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

OLEN

Hirsch is a common Jewish name derived from the German word for deer. In Hebrew, it is Tzvi or Ayalah. In Russian, it is Olen.

WAX — KAUFMAN — SHADLESKY

Jay Wax, of Downsview, seeks information not only about his own surname, but tosses in the names of some of his kinsmen.

Wachs pronounced Vox is the product "wax" which was adopted by a dealer in that commodity. The names Zuker (sugar), Saltz (salt) and Pfeffer (pepper) fall into the same category.

Kaufman (literally a buyer) denotes a merchant.

Shadlesky is probably an emasculation of Shidlovsky or Sedlovsky, which comes from the Polish village of Siedliscze near the storied city of Chelm.

Rabin says peace with Syria becoming more urgent

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — If Israel and Syria do not sign a peace treaty within the next two or three years, Israel should prepare for war, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin said last week.

"If within two to three years there is no agreement with the Syrians, I recommend changing the order of priorities and injecting huge sums of money into the Army so it can prepare for the possibility of war," an official quoted Rabin as telling a closed-door meeting of the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee.

The prime minister also said he doubted whether U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher would offer proposals to bridge the gap between Israel and Syria during his Middle East shuttle trip later this month.

Rabin said he opposed such a U.S. move, at least for now.

"I don't remember a time comparable to the period since the end of 1993 when such a large quantity of weapons, including some of the most advanced, has reached Syria," he told the Knesset committee.

"[These include] hundreds of T-72S tanks, the most advanced of their kind, and a substantial number of mobile artillery pieces."

Rabin also warned that Israel "would face a grave situation in the medium and long term if the world did not deal with North Korea, Iran and Iraq."

He was responding to a question by Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu, who accused him of having "demoralized" the nation last month when he said Syria would go to war in three to seven years if the peace process failed.

"If the Syrians perceive that Israel is afraid, they will respond accordingly," said Netanyahu. "I don't recall another prime minister who threatened his own people with war."

In his public comments, Rabin seemed to play down the Syrian military build-up.

"There's nothing new about it," he told reporters after the meeting.

"There is a continuation of the arms race in the region: Saudi Arabia, Israel, Syria. It didn't start yesterday. It's a prolonged process that continues."

In the committee, however, Rabin said Russian president Boris Yeltsin had told him Russia would honor its commitment to the Syrians to sell Damascus spare parts.

If Syria began paying back its $11 billion debt to the Russians, Moscow would also supply their most advanced SA-10 surface-to-air missile, Rabin said.

The News in Brief

Women To Head Rabbis' Group

JERUSALEM — One year after the Conservative movement ordained its first female rabbi in Israel, the association of Conservative rabbis here has elected a woman, Gila Dror, as its chairperson.

Dror, a mother of three, was born in Petach Tikva and grew up in an Orthodox home.

Speaking on Israel Radio, she termed her election "a revolution, a step forward. This is the first time, as far as I am aware, that a woman will be heading a rabbinical body anywhere in the world."

There are 140 Conservative rabbis in Israel, she said, adding that she did not consider her election a demonstration of tokenism or a provocation.

"I have worked in Israel for four years and worked with all my heart for the association."

Israel Lifts S.A. Embargo

JERUSALEM — Israel has lifted its seven-year embargo on the sale of arms to South Africa.

The original ban, passed in March 1987, did not impose a full arms embargo. It allowed for existing contracts with South Africa to be honored but prohibited any new agreements from being signed.

Earlier this month, that restriction was lifted by the cabinet in recognition of the changes that have taken place in South Africa and in accordance with the easing of trade restrictions by the international community.

Foreign Minister Shimon Peres told the Knesset that a delegation from South Africa visited Israel last November to work out an agreement with the Israel Defence Force on pre-conscript paramilitary training.

Knesset Looks at Adoption

JERUSALEM — The Knesset last week took a first step toward passage of a bill that will bring procedures for adopting children from abroad into line with accepted international conventions.

In Israel, where the number of local children available for adoption has become smaller, many couples have been adopting children from South American countries and Romania.

While most of these adoptions posed only minimal legal problems, some have resulted in international legal battles and human tragedies.

The proposed legislation seeks to remedy this by making Israeli adoptions conform with international norms.

In a related development, the Movement for Progressive Jewry, which is affiliated with Reform Judaism, announced last week the opening of a centre for the conversion of adopted children of non-Jewish origin.

Early Release for Spy Rejected

TEL AVIV — After 11 years in prison, an Israeli convicted of spying for the former Soviet Union has lost an appeal for early release.

Prof. Marcus Klingberg, 76, once a prominent biologist, was convicted in a closed-door trial in 1983 for passing information about germ warfare to Moscow.

Klingberg recently suffered two strokes, and his attorney has been campaigning for his release.

But at a recent hearing at the Ashkelon prison, a prison review panel upheld a request by state prosecutors to reject the appeal, stating Klingberg "still represents a threat to state security."

Klingberg immigrated to Israel in 1948, shortly after independence. After studying medicine, he was appointed a professor of epidemiology and subsequently rose to the post of deputy head of the Biological Institute in Ness Ziona, near Rehovot.

He disappeared in 1983 while on his way to a scientific convention in Europe. Rumors spread that he had defected to the Soviet Union.

Israelis only learned last August that Klingberg was in prison for espionage. He was sentenced to 18 years and has been held in solitary confinement.

Paris Jewish Centre Closes

PARIS — Local real estate regulations have forced the Jewish Community Centre of Paris to close.

The centre, which has served its 3,500 members and an estimated 25,000 visitors annually for the past 32 years, was a well-known site among natives and tourists alike. It was scheduled to close its doors by the end of June.

The centre had long failed to comply with local safety regulations. After turning a blind eye to the matter for years, local authorities recently insisted on compliance — a move the centre's officials said would be prohibitively expensive.

As well, the centre's rent was raised to a level that was deemed too expensive.

Directors of the centre expressed their desire to move to a new location as quickly as possible.

Cuban Shul Links With Conservative

HAVANA — Congregation Casa de la Comunidad Hebrea de Cuba has become the first Cuban synagogue to affiliate with the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism.

The 100-member congregation, founded in 1953, has long been searching for links with fellow Jews.

The synagogue has no fulltime rabbi. For the past several years a rabbi from Guadalajara, Mexico has traveled to Cuba to perform life-cycle ceremonies. The first bar mitzvah in 35 years took place last December.

According to Rabbi David Blumenfeld of United Synagogue, the congregation is attempting to bring in a cantor in time for Rosh Hashanah.

Anti-Semitism Via Computers

NEW YORK — Increasing quantities of anti-Semitic and racist material are being spread worldwide through computer networks, according to the World Jewish Congress's annual report on anti-Semitism.

Anti-Semitism World Report 1994 warns that the computer networks are almost inaccessible to law enforcement agencies.

"The growth area of 'anti-Semitica' in the 1990s is the dissemination of racist and anti-Semitic propaganda by electronic means," the 270-page report states.

As an example, it cited the U.S.-based National Socialist German Workers Party's Overseas Organization distribution of a neo-Nazi magazine by computer network to Austria, Germany, France and the Netherlands.

German Rightist Sentenced

MANNHEIM — A state court in this southwestern German city has convicted Gunter Deckert, head of the extreme right-wing National Democratic Party, on charges of inciting racial hatred.

The court this month sentenced Deckert to a one-year suspended jail sentence and a fine equalling $6,250.

Charges were initially brought against Deckert after he served as translator at a 1991 rally for American Holocaust denier Fred Leuchter.

Deckert had said he supported Leuchter's theories.

Last March, the Federal Court of Justice, Germany's highest appeals court, reversed a lower court ruling that simply denying the Holocaust occurred was not in itself a punishable offence.

The high court then sent the case back to the lower court to determine whether Deckert subscribes to Nazi ideology, which is a punishable offence.

Lubavitch Seek Rare Books

NEW YORK — Despite — and even because of the passing of the Lubavitcher rebbe — the movement's emissaries are continuing to press the Russian government to return a Lubavitch library of more than 12,000 books and 300 manuscripts held at the Russian State Library in Moscow.

The matter was raised this month during a meeting in Washington between Jewish leaders and visiting Russian Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin.

Retrieval of the collection, which was appropriated by the Soviets in 1921 and placed at the former Lenin Library, was a priority of the late Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, who died June 12.

Seven of the rare books accompanied U.S. President Bill Clinton on his return from Europe in February and another was returned personally by Vice President Al Gore, who was given the volume during a visit to Moscow last December.

Jews Turn Down Russian PM

WASHINGTON — American Jewish leaders turned down a request by Russian Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin to help his country secure most-favored-nation trade status on a permanent basis.

At a meeting with the prime minister here last Tuesday, the dozen Jewish leaders told Chernomyrdin that they favor a continued waiver of the Jackson-Vanik Amendment, which for years barred the Soviet Union from special trade status because of its policy on emigration.

The Jewish leaders said they cannot support a waiver at this time.

Though there has been substantial progress on the emigration front in recent years, there is still "more progress to be made in the emigration area before we can support a presidential finding that Russia is in full compliance" on Jackson-Vanik, said Mark Levin, executive director of the National Conference on Soviet Jewry.

At the one-and-a-half hour meeting, the Jewish activists also discussed anti-Semitism and fascism in Russia.

O. J. Simpson, publicity, and privacy

The allegations against O.J. Simpson should be tried in a court of law, not in the media. He should be deemed by all of us to be innocent until proven guilty. Jewish law is even more stringent. The accused would not be convicted of murder unless two competent witnesses were present and specifically warned him of the consequences of his actions beforehand. Moreover, the widely released transcripts and audio recording of the 911 distress call made by Mr. Simpson's ex-wife will make it very difficult for Mr. Simpson to obtain a fair trial. They appear to be bone-chilling statements made by a woman in true fear of her safety and a man intent on hurting her. The public should therefore be cautious about concluding Simpson's guilt as a result of the publicity surrounding these terrible events.

But this same publicity has done much good by focusing attention on wife abuse and calling into question the concept that fame and fortune should be equated with success. Simpson is not the first famous celebrity with family problems or a violent disposition: from Henry VIII to Beethoven and beyond, greatness has been a public, not private, mantle. By contrast, in Jewish law, greatness is found in the pleasantness with which you treat your spouse and children, in private. Historically, in obscure and poorer segments of Jewish society, our sages measured success entirely by the degree of shalom beis or peace in the home. Have a tranquil summer and a good Shabbos.

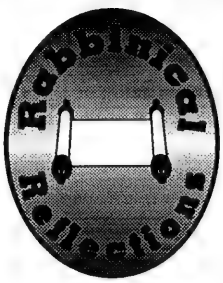
"NACHAS" BY MIRIAM LANAIL



By RABBI LEIGH LERNER

Every translation changes the meaning. Every interpreter brings a different perspective to the words. Moses, God's faithful servant, interpreted God's words to the people and changed their meaning in this week's sedrah, Matot-Mas'ey.

The portion contains a curious set of verses. In Bamidbar 31:2 God speaks of nikmat b'nei Yisrael, the vengeance of the children of Israel on the Midianites. In verse 3, Moses conveys the idea to the people in a different way: "the vengeance of the Lord on Midian." Midrash Tanchuma picks up this difference and suggests a reason for Moses' change.

The Israelites said to God, "If we had been idolaters or deniers of the mitzvot, the Midianites would not have hated us. See, they hate us because of the Torah, which You gave us, so vengeance belongs to You."

Few of us, not even Moses, care to take responsibility for vengeance. Yet the Torah verse is clear. It's a command to Moshe: "Avenge the Israelite people on the Midianites."

Moses tries to squeak out of his task in midrash Bamidbar Rabbah. Instead of going himself to Midian to wreak revenge, he appoints troops to do it for him. He thinks, "It's not right for me to cause distress to a people who have been good to me, as the proverb says, 'Do not cast a stone into the cistern from which you drank.' "

Shlichato kemoto, a person's agent is the same as himself. At a brit, the father makes the mohel the agent in the circumcision of his son, and it's as if he did it himself. In revenge, for those who recruit troops to their aid or hire another to harass the object of their ire, it's as if they were doing it themselves. Moses' hands are no less bloody because he sent agents to fight Midian. So our hands are no less dirty when we instigate the harassment of others, whether via poisoning family relationships, abusing the law courts, or playing games on the telephone.

Moses tried to interpret his way out of wreaking revenge on Midian. In our day, once we have taken revenge, we seek to interpret our way out of what we have done. It wasn't vengeance, we say. We call it justice, a chance to even the account, to bring balance to a world whose scales are too often tipped in favor of the powerful. But vengeance? Not pretty; not at all. So we say with Tanchuma that vengeance belongs to God.

Sometimes we mean that it is up to God to take revenge for the suffering we have undergone. Too often we mean that God approves the infliction of suffering in return, as if we were allowed to be both judge and jury. The world is a gentler place when we wait for God to act. Lo tikom, you shall not take revenge on one another.

Israel's Arrow: A new way to reduce war?

By DAVID BAR-ILLAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

The success of the recent Arrow test launch is good news not only for Israel, but for all democracies. For the achievement of Israel Aircraft Industries is a step towards developing an effective defence against a weapon which for half a century has been in effect invincible.

That Israel is a pioneer in destroying this invincibility is a proud accomplishment. As Defense Ministry Director-General David Ivri put it, the results were particularly significant, because they were attained in a new technological field in which experience is minimal. One of Arrow's developers, Ovadia Harari, was less reserved. "We are writing the book," he said.

Ever since the last years of World War II, when the Nazis attacked Britain with a crude version of today's ballistic missiles, the only defence against such attacks was either preemptive or retaliatory. That is, either the launching pads of the missiles could be destroyed, or the attacker could be threatened with costly retaliation. In fighting totalitarian regimes, such countermeasures are woefully inadequate.

The Gulf War proved that little has changed since the days of the German V2s. American early-warning satellites and their control stations on the ground could detect a missile launch and compute and transmit data on the time and general area of the missile's arrival within seconds of the launch. But the only available interceptors, the Patriots, were ineffective in protecting the civilian population. Intended for the defense of limited strategic areas, such as ports, airports, and military installations, the Patriots could only deflect the Iraqi Scuds from their course at the last stages of their flight. They could not and did not protect cities.

The Arrow is a far more sophisticated weapon. Once it becomes operational, it should be able to destroy warheads, not just deflect them, and it should intercept incoming missiles at an earlier stage of their flight. This is particularly important against missiles carrying non-conventional warheads: the mere deflection of incoming chemical, biological, or nuclear carriers is obviously useless.

On the test day, the Arrow pursued the attack missile, locked on it through its sensors, and destroyed it. The day's goal was thus attained, but the experiment was still embryonic, made under "laboratory conditions" - the attack missile was not fired at random, but on a pre-determined course. Yet the test met all expectations, and it bodes well for the development of an effective defence against ballistic missiles within the next three to six years.

The results also enhance the prospects of continued American participation in financing the project. As American observers at the site stressed, it is not only the scientific accomplishment that merits continued American support, but the Israeli ability to reach this stage at half of what an equivalent development by the American military would cost.

Assuming that the development of the Arrow proceeds according to plan, the operational deployment of the weapon will just about coincide with the time Iran and Iraq are expected to have nuclear capabilities. Iraq is still constrained by UN inspections, but Iran, like Syria, has acquired Scud C missiles from North Korea, whose range is 355 miles.

Both countries are interested in the new North Korean missiles, whose development was made possible by the sudden availability of scores of Russian missile experts, who have brought advanced technologies to the North Korean effort. A completely redesigned Scud, known as the Nodong 1, with an estimated range of up to 770 miles, was flight-tested last year. North Korean and Russian engineers are also working on an entirely new missile, dubbed the Nodong 2, believed to have two stages and an estimated range of 1155 miles. And an even more powerful missile, reported by Jane's, may reach the range of 1,925 miles.

With such formidable weapons in the hands of totalitarian regimes, it is not only Israel that is threatened. That is why the United States, despite defence cuts, is developing the Theater High Altitude Area Defence (THAAD) program, which is expected to have a new missile interceptor ready for use even before the Arrow, probably as early as 1996. And the U.S. Navy is working on ship-based ballistic missile defences.

None of these anti-missile missiles can be effective without a foolproof early warning system. The United States is developing space-based sensors which would supplement early-warning satellites with a global space-tracking system. It would consist of a constellation of several dozen small satellites at relatively low altitudes, each with several different sensors for detecting and tracking even cold objects in space.

The Gulf War proved that the damage conventional missiles can inflict is limited. But it also showed that even the most advanced technological devices cannot find missile launchers, particularly mobile ones, and destroy them. The importance of intercepting missiles effectively, particularly if they are armed with non-conventional warheads, is therefore paramount. And the development of the Arrow and similar weapons is essential if totalitarian regimes are to be effectively deterred.

Haredim win battle of billboards in Israel

By CARL ALPERT

The battle of the billboards in Israel is over and the haredim have won.

The struggle began when ultra-Orthodox Israelis, primarily in Jerusalem, began protesting against what they considered pornographic advertising, showing women in various stages of undress.

Bus shelters containing such ads were defaced and later burned down. Then came the threat of the haredim to boycott all products which resorted to such advertising. Considering the purchasing power of Jerusalem's Orthodox is estimated at 40 per cent or more of the potential market, the threat was a real one.

Now the war is over. The advertising agencies concerned have yielded and have agreed to a new code governing their ads, according to which there will be no more ladies in bikinis presented in larger-than-life size, no more naked limbs, no more undressed women crawling on all fours, no more suggestive double entendres.

Reaction in the press has been mixed. One writer complained indignantly and wondered what will be banned next — pictures of men without head covering?

A woman columnist, Irit Linor, writing in Haaretz, drew approving nods from many readers when she commented that the absence of big poster pictures of women in bathing suits and shapely models in alluring poses will mean that for some of the population an element of joy will have gone out of life.

Furthermore, she went on, the threat of economic boycott constituted a serious violation of freedom of expression, and a crude intervention by the forces of reaction and darkness in the normal operations of a free market.

She continued, however, on a completely different tack. Having said the above, she admitted she was sick and tired of being confronted with pictures of slender models, tempting her to buy bathing suits and other products in the delusion that she, too, can look like the pictures.

It appears, Irit wrote, that advertising copy writers believe associating any product with pictures of semi-naked women will somehow stimulate sales.

The new ban should now prove conclusively, she said, that the absence of sex themes from the billboards will not result in diminished sales. In fact there is no evidence whatever that the kind of advertising so popular today has any effect at all on sales. These are not the themes which induce people to buy.

Want to increase sales? She has her own sage advice. Just put up a notice regarding the product, whatever it is, together with a banner announcing a 50 per cent discount is in effect — and watch the sales mount!

We ought to be grateful to the haredim for cleaning up the advertising atmosphere, she concluded — and that's a kind of freedom too.

Spokesmen for the billboard companies said morality had nothing to do with their adoption of the new policy. Their job is to serve the market, not to fight it. There is indeed a law against public pornography. The Orthodox could have made the matter a legal one by going to the courts and launching an all-out assault against the extremes to which some advertising has gone.

It could make a convincing case that showing pictures of women in sensual poses has nothing to do with the qualification of the automobile being offered, but was merely pandering to the erotic. Court battles revolving around definitions of pornography could have dragged on for years, but this would not have meant sales would go up; perhaps to the contrary.

The Orthodox chose the more direct and immediate path. If we don't like the way you advertise, we have the right and the freedom not to buy your products — and we won't.

The billboards are being cleaned up. Commercial peace has been restored, at least for the time being. But the secular elements in the country are licking their wounds, determined to renew the struggle against the new and unlikely coalition which now faces them — the Orthodox allied with feminists intent on preserving the dignity of womanhood.

Pragmatism replaces ideology in the Mideast

By ARNOLD AGES

The widely circulated photograph which appeared in early May showing an Israeli and Omani participant at a conference on water was worth far more than the proverbial 1,000 words.

The picture symbolized what may become, it is hoped, a new era of cooperation between Israel and its Arab neighbors.

In April of this year negotiations were held in the Persian Gulf state of Oman on issues related to water conservation and utilization in the Middle East. This meeting was one of a series over the past several years but it was the first at which a high profile Israeli delegation (including a contingent of Israeli journalists) participated fully.

Peter Feuilherade, writing in The Middle East, a London-based publication (and one that has not always been friendly towards Israel in its reporting on the Middle East), notes that only two Arab states absented themselves from the Oman conclave, Syria and Lebanon. The Damascus regime, consistent with its anti-Israel rhetorics, blasted Israel's presence at the meeting as evidence of the Jewish State's wish to dominate Arab markets while occupying Arab land.

Five years ago Saudi Arabia would undoubtedly have echoed and endorsed Syria's strident anti-Israel stance but, possibly because of the Gulf War and other mitigating circumstances, Riyadh has discovered a new pragmatism in the conduct of its foreign affairs. This is the only way to explain the position adopted by the Saudi-backed and highly influential Arabic newspaper Al Sharq al Aswat (The Middle East) which allowed that since water was vital to the region it was hard to see how any substantive progress could be made without Israel's input.

Arnold Ages

The Arab language newspaper put it very bluntly: "Putting the region right cannot be done by boycotting the Israelis. They are present in it, and are a powerful and potentially destructive force. If these conferences succeed in solving water problems and averting future wars, we should be pleased." Unfortunately, the newspaper did not urge an end to the Arab economic boycott of Israel but that, as they say, is another story.

It appears the pragmatic spirit symbolized in this statement animated the deliberations in Oman. According to Feuilherade, the Muscat group agreed on five different projects proposed by Oman, the United States, Germany and the European Union. In addition, the conference created a Palestinian water authority which will function in areas evacuated by Israel and it also backed an Israeli plan to rehabilitate municipal water supply systems in the region.

The readiness of the Gulf States, and Oman in particular, to welcome Israel to a conference on water policy cannot be minimized. In the 46 years since Israel's birth this is the first time that Jerusalem has been invited by an Arab state to deliberate on a non war-related subject. It is significant, moreover, that statements attributed to the Israeli delegation contained no spirit of triumphalism. The presence of the delegation in Oman was high profile enough.

Avraham Katz-Oz, the head of the Israeli team, did make some modest claims in asserting simply that Israel had been invited to join the water steering committee that would be based in Oman.

The inference is quite clear: Israel expects to be invited to future meetings. What is equally significant in Katz-Oz's statement is that the Oman-based water steering committee — which will contribute to desalinization projects using solar energy — will have a branch in Israel. It appears that an ongoing reciprocity arrangement is in the making between Israel and Oman.

Does this recent meeting in Oman mean peace is breaking out between Israel and the Arab world? It may be premature to put an exceedingly positive construction on a simple conference dealing with water issues. Seasoned observers of the Middle East suggest, moreover, that Israel's presence in Oman was merely a symbolic event that cannot lead to concrete results without direct talks involving Syria, Jordan and Lebanon.

Perhaps, but in the Middle East symbolic events contain atomic densities of great magnitude. Discussions about water, the life-line of the parched Middle East, are not symbolic but concrete in the extreme. This explains the upbeat reactions of people like Yossi Beilin (one of the architects of the Israel-PLO accords) who views with quiet optimism Israel's participation in Oman as a sign of his nation's expanding political horizons. Equally optimistic are the views of Israeli businessmen who see opportunities in the Gulf States for Israel in agriculture, medical service and high-technology electronics.

It has been said that it is the optimists in this world who get things done. There are, it appears, optimists on both sides. The leaders of Oman, Bahrain and the Gulf States in general want to place their countries on a solid footing for the future, when their oil supplies decline. They understand the expertise which Israel has developed in science, hydrology and electronics could eventually help them diversify and approach self-sufficiency in food production. They also realize that progress cannot be put on hold while every aspect of an Arab-Israeli peace agreement is concluded. Wisely Oman and her neighbors have vaulted over the thickets of ideology and rhetoric and embraced a pragmatism that can serve all the interests of the states in the region.

The Problem of Agunot — A Call to Action

by EVELYN BROOKE

Thank you for inviting me to address you in this issue of ASAP. You have given me the opportunity to welcome you to the Coalition of Jewish Women for the Get, and ICAR, the International Coalition for Agunah Rights.

The Canadian Coalition organizations are: B'nai Brith Women of Canada, Canadian Hadassah WIZO, Emunah Women of Canada, Jewish Women's Federation-Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, Na'amat Canada, National Council of Jewish Women, Status of Women Committee of Canadian Jewish Congress, Women's Canadian ORT and Women's Federation-Federation Combined Jewish Appeal.

The Jewish Federation themes for the last three years have been Jewish identity, the Jewish family and Jewish continuity. It is time for the Jewish community to recognize and address the woman whose identity is agunah, and the uniqueness of her single parent family.

The plight of the agunah and her family is not a women's issue but a Jewish family issue, a Jewish continuity issue.

An agunah is a woman whose (ex-)husband is either unwilling or unable to give her a Get, a Jewish divorce. This man condemns his wife to the status of agunah; he condemns her to a life alone; she is denied the companionship and support of a good marriage. Without a Get the agunah cannot remarry and she is prohibited from having children. There is no Jewish continuity through her. Perhaps, as a result of their experience, she and her children will be alienated from the Jewish community. There will be no Jewish continuity through her children.

Statistics on agunot are hard to come by. In a recent CJN article a staff reporter writes that a 1987 B'nai Brith Canada study reported that 311 Canadian cases involved "conflict or disagreement in procurement of the Get" between 1982 and 1985. Rabbi Mordechai Ochs, chair of Toronto's Beth Din Tzedek is actively dealing with about half a dozen cases in Toronto. John Syrtash, Toronto lawyer and expert in Gets, says he has about 10 agunot as clients.

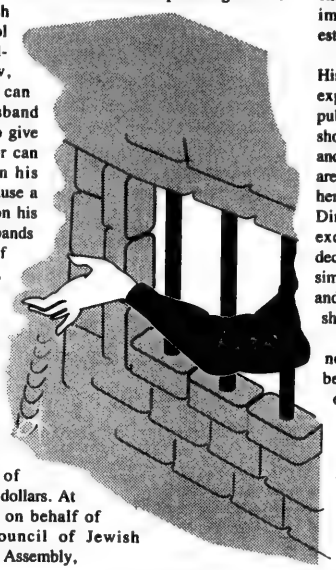
Jewish divorce can be simple. However the truth, as we have come to know it, is that the power given to husbands by Jewish law has been a tool for abuse. According to Jewish law, only the husband can give a Get. A husband cannot be forced to give his wife a Get; nor can anyone other than his designated agent cause a Get to be written on his behalf. Jewish husbands have for reasons of extortion, vengeance or malice withheld the Get. There are cases where a wife or her family have been forced to ransom her freedom. Husbands have asked from tens of thousands of dollars to a million dollars. At our demonstration on behalf of agunot at the Council of Jewish Federation's General Assembly, November 1993, a young woman told us that her Get had cost her father "two hundred thousand dollars (U.S.)." Women who have received civil divorces with fair settlements have had to give up all or part of their alimony, child support or were forced to rearrange custody of their children. To malicious, abusive husbands money is not as important as the power they can maintain over their estranged or "ex-wives' " lives.



The most effective weapon any abuser has is silence. His wife is silent because she does not know that she should expose him or she wants to defend their children from a public embarrassment. An agunah or a potential agunah should go to her rabbi or to the Bet Din (a Rabbinical Court) and ask that her husband be invited to give her a Get. There are halakhic (Jewish legal) means to liberate a woman from her vacant marriage. It is possible, for example, for a Bet Din to issue a seruv to a recalcitrant spouse. The seruv excommunicates him until the Get is given. The public declaration asks that the recalcitrant spouse not be invited to simchot (Jewish celebrations), not be given Torah honours, and not be asked to share a meal. Even business dealings should be avoided, if possible.

Some rabbis believe that our diverse community will not cooperate. We, in the Coalition, do not agree. We believe that an informed community will expend every effort to alleviate a Jewish person's pain.

Agunot* need the entire community to participate, to indicate to men that withholding a Get from their wives is immoral and intolerable. It is up to the women leaders in the Jewish community to point out this blind spot in the Jewish agenda.

The Unending Marriage: A Scholarly Commentary

by RACHEL TURKIENICZ

...and he shall write her a writ of divorce and give it into her hand...
— (Deut.24:1)

In the book of Deuteronomy, the Bible briefly discusses the dissolving of a marriage between a man and a woman. It is clear from the textual verse that the active agent is the man (he writes the bill of divorce) and the passive agent is the woman. There have been many laws derived from this verse and the divorce ceremony within Jewish law has resulted.

Although many expansions have taken place, the situation remains today, in traditional Judaism, that the man must divorce the woman. Should a woman decide to end her marriage, and her spouse disagrees, he can hold her hostage within the marriage by refusing to grant this divorce. What results is that she remains married. Today, should she obtain only a civil divorce and remarry, Jewish law would view her as still married to her first husband since he granted her no Jewish divorce. Therefore, her second union would be considered an adulterous one - any resulting children would be viewed as mamzerim (illegitimate).

A woman locked into a marriage by her husband is called an "agunah." In Judaism today this issue burns to the core of our sense of family, commitment and fairness. It occurs far too often for us to comfortably label it an anomaly. And yet we do not encounter such situations arising to any great degree in the ancient literature.

Assuming that the nature of men and women have not drastically changed through the ages, one would expect the Bible, as well as rabbinic literature, to be riddled with horrendous situations, and yet they are not. What has changed in our world that brings us to this point?

When one hears the word "agunah" today, one immediately pictures a vindictive male flexing what he views as final control upon a rejecting female. However, the issue of agunah is broader than this image. If a soldier is missing in battle with no verifiable proof of his demise, his wife now becomes agunah, since he cannot physically divorce her. If he never returns, she is doomed to never again remarry. Interestingly, this element of agunah does appear in the literature:

"All who went out to the wars of the house of David writes a bill of divorce to his wife"
— (Shabbat.56a)

In debating the relationship between David and Batsheba, the rabbis discuss whether David is guilty of adultery, since Batsheba was married to Uriah, an officer in David's army. The statement shows that the rabbis claim all the soldiers of the time would divorce their wives before going to war. Thus, should they become missing in action, their wives are free to continue with their lives. It is true that this view absolves David of the sin of adultery, but it also points toward a preemptive solution of the agunah problem. And yet, no such preemptive suggestion appears for the woman who cannot obtain a divorce from an unwilling husband. If one assumes the latter situation was far less common than today, one must ask why are men more able to bind their wives today than they were years ago.

A possible answer may lie in viewing the divorce in the context of the marriage as a whole. The statement in Deuteronomy of delivering the document "into her hand" is interpreted quite literally. In order for a husband to divorce his wife she must physically accept this document. If she does not do so, the divorce is not complete; she has prevented her husband from divorcing her. Likewise, the marriage contract, or ketubah, is given from the man to the woman under the chupah (marriage canopy). This contract obligates the man to his responsibilities toward his wife during the marriage. The ketubah must be physically accepted by the woman. The parallel situation drawn between the two opposite contracts shows that the law cannot force a status upon anyone. One can only be a married person if one accepts that status; one can only be a divorced person if one accepts that status. Yet I believe the parallel does not end there.

It is possible that the key to our situation of "hostage marriages" today lies in the fact that we have made the ketubah an inactive document. If, for a moment, we step back in time to when there was no parallel civic legal procedure of marriage, the ketubah was the sole legal document of marriage. Within that contract the man accepts the responsibility of providing for his wife not just financially, but sexually as well. It is the man's responsibility to satisfy his wife's physical desires. By handing this document to the woman the system has empowered her enormously.

"...the key to our situation of "hostage marriages" today lies in the fact that we have made the ketubah an inactive document."

A ketubah defines the terms of the marriage, and these terms are in fact also the grounds for divorce. As long as the marriage is sound and both people are happy, the ketubah sits in a drawer and collects dust. Only upon considering divorce, or pursuing one, does the ketubah get pulled out and brought to a Jewish court. It is in this court, in a public forum, that the woman can "demand" her ketubah. This means she demands a divorce because the terms of the ketubah have not been met. In a public forum, with her husband present, the woman can openly claim that he is ineffective in satisfying her physical needs. His masculine reputation is in her hands and the courts have put it there.

With this power at her disposal, a husband may think twice before denying a woman her divorce. Would it not be simpler to grant her wish, rather than have the affair drawn out and publicized - to his detriment!

Unfortunately, the power granted to the woman in the ketubah has been lost today through the civil marriage license. Jewish courts are no longer public. The ketubah is a technicality and not the balancing document it was intended to be. The marriage document empowered the woman, while the divorce document empowered the man. Tragically today, we have neutralized the power of one - thereby creating a monopoly of power for the other.

ASAP

We can help Agunot...

...Individually

- pass on information about Get
- escort your friend or relative to the Bet Din
- ask your community's leaders and rabbis to speak out about agunot
- ask the men in your life to speak out against recalcitrance in Get cases
- encourage women who are agunot to contact the Coalition and perhaps we can, together, help them to liberation
- bring family and friends to any event sponsored by ICAR and/or the Canadian Coalition

...as a Community

- we must inform the members of our community about the laws of divorce, civil and Jewish (specifically Section 21:1 of the Divorce Act). The civil court cannot order a man to give his wife a Get. The civil court can only ask the plaintiff and the respondent if all barriers to the religious remarriage of the other spouse have been removed. If either party responds in the negative, the judge can apply sanctions
- we must encourage couples to pursue a Get prior to the decree of their civil divorce
- if a spouse refuses to participate in the Get process, we must use our influence to change his/her mind
- Jewish organizations and institutions, religious and secular, should make constitutional changes or pass by-laws denying membership to spouses who refuse to participate in the Get process
- if a spouse is adamant in his/her refusal to give or accept a Get, if that spouse refuses to appear at the Bet Din, if the Bet Din has issued a seruv, every Jew should respect the seruv and that spouse's company should be avoided
- recalcitrant spouses should be denied awards and recognition as exemplary leaders and community role models
- a support group for agunot should be established
- lists of Get abusers should be published in Jewish journals

What We Ask of Our Rabbis

- rabbis should inform brides and grooms about the laws of marriage and divorce
- couples should sign prenuptial agreements stating that in the event they divorce, the husband will give the Get and the wife will accept it
- everyone in the Jewish community should understand the purpose and functioning of their local Bet Din
- rabbis and others should influence recalcitrant spouses to do what is halakhicly correct - give or accept the Get
- rabbis should implement all halakhic means to release agunot from their vacant marriages
- rabbis should invite recalcitrant spouses to the Bet Din. If the spouses refuse to appear three times, rabbis should issue seruvim
- Jewish courts, Batei Din, should issue the names of recalcitrant spouses
- rabbinic authorities should find immediate solutions for outstanding agunah cases and should find means to prevent further cases

Women's Image: Beyond the Looking Glass

by Ariella Hyams

Is there a Jewish dimension to issues of women's appearance and body size? Absolutely, say members of a panel on Women's Image: Beyond the Looking Glass, held at Beth Tzedec Synagogue in May, sponsored by the Jewish Women's Federation. A standing-room-only crowd listened to the three-member panel, asked questions, discussed issues and signed a petition requesting that more attention be paid to issues affecting girls' self-esteem in the schools and eating disorders in children and adolescents.

Paula Caplan, a psychologist and author of Don't Blame Mother: Mending the Mother-Daughter Relationship, spoke of the dynamic between the two Jewish female stereotypes, both of them negative: the controlling Jewish mother and the self-interested Jewish princess, or "JAP." One is too Jewish, the other not Jewish enough, Caplan told the over 400 women and men in attendance. Both, she said, "scapegoat the group."

Paediatrician and Toronto Star columnist Diane Sacks noted in her talk that medical personnel have traditionally classified eating disorders such as anorexia and bulimia, with their perfectionistic, upper-middle-class clientele, as "Jewish disorders." She expanded on the subject of eating disorders in the young, noting that in the appearance-mad world of teenage women, 75 percent classified themselves as "overweight" in a recent Long Island Jewish Hospital survey. Three years later, the girls in the group who had been dieting had noticeable bone loss - their quest for thinness was more likely (than those who did not diet) to end with osteoporosis after they reached the age of 50. "You can't blame just the media," said Sacks. "Our children can blame us. Sixty-seven percent of the mothers in this group were on diets."

The third speaker on the panel was Carla Rice, a consultant with the Body Image Project at Women's College Hospital, which works to reconcile women with the social demands placed upon them by society's concept of how women should look. "As women have moved into public realms," Rice noted, showing slides of fashion models and advertisements, "we have tried to take up less and less space." She cited a study that showed that since the days of curvaceous Marilyn Monroe as a role model in the 1950's, women's average body size has grown 4 percent while the average size of women in advertising and entertainment has decreased 25 percent. The gap, noted Rice, is impossible to bridge. Women feel that in some way, no matter what their body shape, they can't measure up; and turn increasingly to cosmetic surgery as a result. The surgeons they think of as their allies may be exacerbating the problem for profit: the American cosmetic surgeons' professional association has in recent years tried to have small breasts classified as a dis-ease.

Caplan reached into history to document her theme of linking women's body image issues with Jewish issues. In centuries-old European Jewish communities, she said, Jewish women had to do everything for the household except study. Jewish women were very much involved in their societies and consequently they were the most learned members of the community about the "outside" culture. When these families came to North America, they ran headlong into a culture that prized women who appeared submissive, soft-spoken, and less socially involved. Hence the stereotypes of Jewish women, for which the culture pays a painful price. "Sociologists are beginning to document how 'JAP' bashing contributes to Jewish intermarriage," writes American feminist writer Letty Cottin Pogrebin, "by influencing more and more Jewish men to disdain and avoid Jewish women."

All members of the panel encouraged the audience to help themselves and their daughters move beyond current stereotyping with a healthy skepticism about media representations of women and encouragement of one another to feel good about themselves as they are. Ban Barbie dolls, Diane Sacks told the group. Take risks, added Paula Caplan: "If you're not failing most of the time, you're not doing it right." Rice remembered a time when she thought lovingly of the softness and acceptance of her mother's and grandmother's bodies and advocated a spiritual and creative approach to women's taking back control of their own image - to no longer, as she has stated, "collude in their own oppression."

HOW TO: Take Action Against Negative Images of Women in the Media

Many women want to see changes in the way the media approaches women's image. Often the desired changes seem to be common sense and not at all "political" so we tend to think they will just happen. But change hardly ever just happens. We cannot afford to let the experts make decisions on their own concerning advertising and content which is offensive and/or misleading.

Therefore, we have outlined some steps we hope will help you become more active in combating negative images of women in the media.

Although it is essential to personally boycott magazines, television programs etc. which foster negative image ideals, keeping the offensive material out of your home is not enough. You must let the editor, producer and advertiser know what you are boycotting and why. Formulate your complaint in writing and mail it to the editor in chief of the written publication; or for images on television, write to the network president. Be sure to send copies to the advertisers of the segment.

When product advertisements or the products themselves are offensive, write to:

a) The company's head office (Chief Executive Officer) as well as the company's local branch and distributors.
b) The outlet where seen (TV station, magazine, TTC, or retail distributor).

Make complaints regarding misleading advertising to the Bureau of Competition, Market Practices Branch, Place du Portage, Phase 2, 5th floor, 50 Victoria Street, Hull, Quebec, K1A 0C9.

Remember, your individual response can make a difference when you let the responsible organizations know what you think.

A Positive Image: What You Can Do

(from the resource booklet for Body Image, created by the JWF Social and Political Action Program Committee, May '94)

- promote acceptance of women in all their diversity; one important aspect of prevention is to promote size, age, ethnic and racial acceptance and encourage people to get beyond appearance, putting their energies into more empowering alternatives
- promote and reinforce positive images of diverse women
- work hard to improve awareness
- surround yourself with positive images of diverse women
- don't support misogynist TV programs or films
- seek out stories in which women are not victims or objects of sexual desire
- pay attention to images around you and make a conscious effort to portray women in all their diversity when given the opportunity
- examine common stereotypes about fat/thin and beauty in daily life and challenge fat-prejudiced attitudes in yourself and others
- de-emphasize appearance and challenge the imperative for women to conform to beauty ideals

Ensuring continuity

The Task Force on Jewish Continuity, Assimilation & Intermarriage has submitted its report to the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto who commissioned it more than two years ago.

The mandate of the Task Force was threefold: "to create a sense of awareness; to encourage the expression and development of ideas, projects and programs that would contribute to maintaining and enhancing continuity; and to develop a comprehensive set of recommendations and procedures that would enable such programs to be developed and implemented."

In the course of their deliberations, Task Force members heard from scores of community groups, met with diverse focus groups and exchanged views with special "think tank" invitees. They have obviously worked hard and with devotion. Their concern is evident on every page of their report. The authors have woven a document about Jewish continuity making more than 50 recommendations, using the universal markers of the Jewish life-cycle as its central, unifying thread.

The report acknowledges that education has always been a cornerstone of Jewish identity and tradition. Yet, due to the fact that the community still awaits hearing from the Federation's Commission on Jewish Education, it does not focus directly on planning for the future of formal Jewish education in greater Toronto. This is unfortunate. The discussion on education must inform the discussion on continuity. For, as we have written before, the two reports are more than complementary. They are flip sides of the same coin.

The key structural recommendation is the establishement of a continuity action committee under the Federation's aegis with an initial annual operating allocation and grants budget of $1.2 million.

In these cash-strapped times, the question begs to be asked: where will this money come from? The report suggests either from endowment funds or from a reallocation of funds previously allocated to local community needs or from those earmarked for the Jewish Agency.

The possibility of funding the continuity committee from present level domestic allocations raises a poignant irony. To stem the tide of diminishing Jewish affiliation and identity, we may inadvertently contribute to it. This is merely one of the many issues raised in the report that must be carefully considered.

The importance of the Task Force's mandate appears early in the report. Indeed, the authors express the distillate of the dilemma: "As Jews, we must continue to hold fast, in these changing and challenging times to the values we have passed on from generation to generation until the present, so that we may perpetuate our people and benefit humanity." Let the public discussion and debate begin.

Addressing war crimes

The American Chief Justice Robert H. Jackson, who headed the Nuremberg war crimes tribunal in 1946, was right when he said of the purpose of the trials against Nazi war criminals: "The wrongs which we seek to condemn and punish have been so calculated, so malignant, and so devastating, that civilization cannot survive their being ignored, because it cannot survive their being repeated."

Justice Jackson was also wrong.

Five decades after Nuremberg, war crimes committed by Nazis have been ignored or shunted off to the periphery of jurisprudence. Western governments no longer seem interested in pursuing Nazi perpetrators of war crimes, although their victims fifty years after the event, still re-live unspeakable traumas.

Jackson, it appears, was also somewhat too categorical in suggesting that civilization cannot bear a repetition of such war crimes. Events in the former Yugoslavia and in Rwanda show that the legacy of the Nuremberg tribunal is pitifully anemic. While scores of thousands of innocent civilians have died in these two areas, world governments transact their daily business with only the occasional, pro forma nod, to the devastation. In this context France's recent decision to unilaterally send troops to Rwanda is an admirable one.

Lamentably, there is a link between the failure of the democracies to vigorously prosecute Nazi war criminals and the current savagery that has exploded in the Serb-Croat-Muslim conflict and the Rwandan outrages. In the last decade, the disinclination of democracies to identify, let alone charge, Nazi war criminals, has had the unfortunate effect of sending out a message to current or potential war criminals.

The message is that governments have been notoriously lethargic in bringing war criminals to justice and that others may depend on a combination of lack of will, bureaucratic paralysis and institutional forgetfulness in the furtherance of their aims and policies.

The message from Nuremberg was very strong; however, the message from governments today is that the perpetrators have merely to lie low until the passage of time grants them re-entry into the body politic.

Letters to the Editor

Letters are welcome if they are brief, in English or French, typewritten with lines double spaced, and of interest to our reading public. Readers are cautioned not to make sweeping claims against persons or institutions which they cannot verify, as libel laws are very stringent. We reserve the right to edit and condense letters, which must bear the sender's address, phone number and both handwritten and typed signatures.

AGUNAH RIGHTS

On behalf of the Canadian Coalition of Jewish Women for the Get and the International Coalition for Agunah Rights (ICAR), I would like to thank you and the staff of The Canadian Jewish News for your excellent coverage of our vigil on Ta'anit Esther. The reporting both before and after the event was of the high calibre that this issue commands.

We appreciate the great effort on the part of your correspondents to cover the events and accurately report on this complicated topic. We are also grateful for the editorial decisions that went into featuring the events.

Over the years we have come to rely on The CJN in our efforts to publicize this problem and educate the community about it. In fact, you and your staff have consistently supported our cause and given this matter the care and attention it deserves. For this consideration and concern, we are expressly grateful.

I hope that our combined efforts will yield a solution to the agunah problem. Perhaps we will find a way to free those chained by the bonds of a non-existent marriage.

TAX RULING ON PROPERTY

The return of properties located in former East Germany to their rightful owners is still in progress three and a half years after reunification of Germany, but Canadian tax authorities have already dealt with one aspect of the tax liability of the new owners.

Frequently rent income is accruing before the Canadian taxpayer attains title and control of the property. Revenue Canada is of the view that any income or gains attributable for the period prior to such date would not be taxable in Canada since such amounts would be considered a windfall, and that the adjusted cost base would be the fair market value on that date.

This ruling was obtained by Window on Canadian Tax Newsletter, a monthly publication issued by CCH Canadian Limited, summarizing memos and other documents from Revenue Canada for the information of the accounting and legal professions.

WITNESS TO THE HOLOCAUST

I feel the Jewish community should express its appreciation and gratitude to Pope John Paul II for his empathy and acts of kindness towards Jews. He has ushered in a potential era of harmonious relations between our faiths. He has recognized the State of Israel, and has been an indefatigable spokesman against anti-Semitism.

It is against that background that I view the proliferation of hate literature and Holocaust denials. For survivors to constantly hear that the Holocaust is a myth concocted by Zionists in order to extract money from Germany, must be galling and excruciating, as well as being a blot upon the memory of the six million who perished.

It is regrettable that the hate literature is finding a receptive audience. A recent study showed that 30 per cent of young Canadians had reservations about the Holocaust.

What is desperately needed is for some eminent and highly respected figure to undertake to establish the truth. Such a personality is none other than Pope John Paul II, who lived in Poland and witnessed the Nazi atrocities.

If he could be prevailed upon to lend his moral authority to the cause, and publicly testify about this horrible Jewish tragedy, he would be balancing the Scales of Justice, and help to preserve Elie Wiesel's commandment "We shall not forget."

MISLEADING IMPRESSION

Re: Crossing Lines by Judith Goldstein, reviewed in "The Jewish experience in the U.S." (CJN June 23)

Our family left Bangor, Maine in 1968 to move to Toronto. At that time Bangor and the surrounding communities numbered some 400 [Jewish] families. There were 2 shuls (one Orthodox and one Conservative) plus one small Orthodox shtiebel; a Jewish Community Centre, a Talmud Torah, a Hebrew Day School, 2 kosher butchers, a Jewish bakery, and a mikvah.

There was no Jewish undertaker but all burial procedures were carried out by the members of the respective shuls.

Not only was there a vibrant Jewish community, but Bangor was one of the highest rated in the United States in per capita purchases of Israeli Bonds.

There were Jewish faculty members at the University of Maine . . . I was one from 1946-1955.

The impression left by the aforementioned article is so misleading — and sad.

HELP NEEDED

I am looking for Holocaust survivors from Poland, as well as Jews who returned to Poland following their release from Soviet Gulags after World War II, to come forward and bear witness both to the persecution and/or killings that they and their friends, relatives and fellow Jews suffered at the hands of a segment of the Polish people after World War II.

This information will be included in a book I am writing on the subject.

I can be contacted at 9 Craig Rd., Springfield, N.J., 07081, or by telephone at (201) 376-7572.

Germany remembers the murdered Gypsies

By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

Just before D-Day, the German Parliament had special commemorative exercises — but not about the Allied invasion of Normandy. They were remembering the half-million people generally known as Gypsies, who were exterminated by the Nazis. The occasion for the special commemoration was the 50th anniversary of an uprising which the condemned staged in the so-called "Gypsy Camp," located in Auschwitz.

In early 1944 untold thousands of this strange and sometimes mysterious tribe had been sent there and had gone to their deaths. But on May 14, 1944, 6,000 of them fought the exterminators with spades, sticks and stones — alas, without success. For their people, the commemoration was a parallel to the Warsaw uprising of Jews in the spring of 1942.

The crimes against the much maligned and misunderstood tribes, said the president of the Bundestag, should be a warning against the injustices being committed against minority groups today, and a reminder to all democrats of their duty to fight every form of discrimination.

Rabbi Plaut

Just who are the Gypsies — or better, the Roma and Sinti, as they prefer to be known? They came, probably many centuries ago, from India and have remained a loosely organized group of nomadic tribes. They generally refer to each other as Rom, meaning "man." Others have many names for them. The English "Gypsy" is derived from Egyptian; the French call them Bohemians, the Swedes refer to them as Tatars, and in Hebrew they are known as tso'anim which is related to the German Zigeuner and the Russian tsigan.

Their occupations have varied from circus entertainers to smiths, musicians and fortune tellers. Even when they were occasionally semi-settled they never became farmers, but continued to earn their livelihood as artisans. Their language, called Romany, is probably of Indian origin and, I have heard it said, is related to Hindi.

Their fate has forced them to develop strong inter-tribal ties, characterized by fidelity, cohesiveness and mutual help.

Like Jews, they have been made into convenient scapegoats throughout their journeys. This prejudice has recently surfaced once again in Germany — hence the special observance by the German Parliament, which was timed to coincide with a Pan-European congress of Roma and Sinti.

Even the English language reveals the prejudice which has dogged the Gypsies, for it appears that "to gyp" is derived from their name, in a way similar to the formerly popular but now abandoned expression "to jew."

I remember this prejudice from my childhood. Whenever I visited my grandparents in western Germany, I was warned that if I did not behave, the Zigeuner would come and steal me. Stealing children was one of the crimes laid at their door in popular perception, but I do not remember that any case of child stealing was proved against them.

The prejudice I remember was not my family's alone; it was common as I grew up. It conjured up all manner of evil pictures about people I had never seen. Only much later did I understand how similar in many ways this was to anti-Jewish prejudice.

Both peoples have appeared to others as the quintessential strangers: little understood and therefore feared. It is the kind of sentiment of which we Jews, of all people, should be wary.

Hebrew classes a weekly bore for these kids

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN

It's a typical Thursday morning. I'm lying in bed, half awake, trying to catch a few last winks. But there's no dozing off. Not with my 4- and 6-year-old sons hovering around my pillow.

I keep my eyes closed and brace myself as one of my sons leans over. "Mom do we have to go to Hebrew Heritage today?," he shouts in my ear.

Every week it's the same question, followed by a very compelling "pleasssssse don't make us go." I never make a decision until I've had my coffee. The caffeine fix doesn't make it easier. It just buys me time.

It's hard to make my kids attend a program they claim to hate. Week after week they beg me not to send them. The Hebrew Heritage program, run in conjuction with the local school board, is supposed to make them feel good about being Jewish.

But it's having the reverse effect. At least in the eyes of Leigh, my 6-year-old. "The Christmas people are luckier than the Hebrew people," he says. "They get Christmas presents, Easter eggs and they don't have to go to Hebrew Heritage."

He tells me this on the days I make him go to the program, which is not that often. The boys have developed a repertoire of tactics to get out of classes — tears, tantrums, feigned illnesses. Tears work pretty well on me. They end up missing quite a bit.

But that upsets my husband. "What do you mean they didn't go to Hebrew?" he'll ask when he finds out they've skipped yet another week.

I'm sympathetic. I realize Hebrew Heritage classes are not as much fun as other after-school activities like swimming and tennis. What kid wants to go to afternoon classes after spending a whole day in school? I remember when I was growing up, kids in my neighborhood went to after-school Hebrew classes. None of them liked going.

It's particularly hard for my kids because we don't live in a Jewish area. We're the only Jewish family on our street and Leigh is the only Jewish child in his class. He resents going to Hebrew Heritage when all his friends get to play.

But motivation is really the underlying problem. It's difficult to get my sons to attend heritage classes when there is so little connection between what they are learning and what goes on at home.

And my husband and I are to blame. We haven't done much — other than light Chanukah candles and make seders — to instill our children with Jewish values. We've been counting on Hebrew Heritage to do it for us.

Our Jewishness is peripheral to our lives. I'm ambivalent about being Jewish. I'm uncomfortable with ethnocentricity of any kind because it is tribal and exclusionary. But at the same time I still feel a connection to my Jewish roots. For most of my life this ambivalence was not an issue. I didn't have to think about my Jewishness, but I do as a parent.

The annual year-end Hebrew Heritage party took place recently. It was held on the last day of classes so I was in a particularly festive mood. I had reason to celebrate. There would be no Thursday theatrics, no arguments about Hebrew Heritage for three months.

At the party the parent who had been running the program appealed for a volunteer to take over her job. My hand went up automatically. I didn't know how it happened or why, it just went up by itself.

"How can you run the Hebrew Heritage program when you can't even get your own kids to go," my husband muttered under his breath. But it was too late to reconsider. All the parents were applauding my decision. And for good reason.

Running the program is a thankless job. Few parents are really committed to sending their kids. So now I'm not only going to have to worry about getting my own kids to Hebrew Heritage, I'm going to have to worry about all the other kids as well.

"Are you the boss of Hebrew Heritage?" Leigh asked me in the car on the way home from the party. I nodded.

"Does that mean we're going to have to go to Hebrew all the time?"

"Probably," I answered.

"What did you do that for?" he yelled.

I'm still asking myself that question.

Israel's right-wing off course

By NECHEMIA MEYERS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

If the Rabin Government is brought down over the peace process, it will be because of misgivings within the Labor Party that are reinforced by provocative statements from Yasser Arafat — not because of anything done by right-wing elements.

This is because the right-wing, in accordance with its time-honored custom, is busy tearing itself apart instead of uniting in opposition to the peaceniks. If it had been united in the last elections, it might well have won a majority of Knesset seats, and now, two years later, it is in even greater disarray. Indeed, it often seems as if Ariel Sharon, David Levy and Rafael Eitan are more interested in replacing Likud leader Binyamin Netanyahu than in toppling Yitzhak Rabin.

Thus the main burden of demonstrating against the present government falls upon the religious right, which is reflected in the fact that most of the male protestors one sees on Israeli streets are wearing skullcaps, while a majority of their female counterparts are clad in the ankle-length skirts favored by Orthodox women and girls.

Even the leaders of the Likud are failing to fulfil their responsibilities, says Prof. Eli Pollak of the Association of Professors for a Strong Israel. Pollak is particularly caustic about the behavior of Knesset members like Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert (who has been absent from 11 non-confidence votes) and superhawk Ariel Sharon (who has been absent from eight).

Their absence, however, doesn't change anything so long as the Government has an assured majority. And that in turn depends not on Olmert and Sharon but on the Labor Knesset Members who recently banded together into a group called the "Third Way." This group insists on a continued Israeli presence in the Jordan Valley, the northern section of the Dead Sea, the Golan Heights and the Etzion Bloc on the outskirts of Jerusalem.

Rabin and Peres cannot afford to ignore supporters of the Third Way, who are more likely to influence the course of events than any number of right-wing speeches and demonstrations.

Tisha b'Av: Beyond Schindler's List

By ERICA MEYER RAUZIN

What kind of religion sets aside a day for the express purpose of being unhappy?

One with a memory, that's what kind. Tisha b'Av, which falls this year on July 17, marks the destruction of the first and second Temples in Jerusalem. We are to ponder these tragedies and the resulting global dispersion of the Jewish people.

This Hebrew date — the ninth of Av — evokes other tragedies. It is said to be the date of the expulsion of the Jews from Spain, a date linked to the start of World War I in Sarajevo, and the date of other sad events in our history.

To me, it is impossible to consider tragic turning points in Jewish history without discussing the Holocaust. Perhaps Tisha b'Av can also help us confront, commemorate, honor, mourn and remember this relatively recent tragedy which continues to touch so many of us every day. The wonder is not that we mourn on Yom Hashoah, the modern day set aside to mark the Holocaust, or on Tisha b'Av, the ancient day of commemoration of destruction, but that we ever leave off mourning.

I am amazed to read commentators, particularly as we travel in the wake of Steven Spielberg's seminal Schindler's List, who complain that Jews have spoken too much of the Holocaust, that we dwell on our losses. How can a community which has built so much on this continent and in Israel be accused of any such thing? We have both mourned and moved forward. But, as was the case in the days of the destruction of the Temples, ignorance about our people is a terrible enemy and provides potent fuel for hatred.

Erica Meyer Rauzin

Author Thomas Keneally and Spielberg did us a favor, in the way that Margaret Mitchell and David O. Selznik did U.S. history a favor. People who will never learn anything else about the U.S. Civil War know something, no matter how limited, because of Gone With the Wind. By the same measure, those who will never read a book of Holocaust memoirs, who will never hear Elie Wiesel speak, who will never meet a survivor, who will never wonder what evil befell Raoul Wallenberg, who do not know Anne Frank, those people will see Schindler's List, and thus they will know something instead of nothing. Ignorance has been dealt a tremendous blow by Keneally and Spielberg.

My teacher about Holocaust is my mother, who escaped Germany as an adolescent. She lost her grandparents, aunts, uncles and cousins, her school friends, her home, her financial security, her country, her youth, and — because of the lack of medical care for Jewish children in Germany in the late 1930s — the hearing in her left ear.

If I fail to evoke in myself a spirit of loss on Tisha b'Av for the sake of the lost Temples, I can think of the great-grandparents I never knew, of the family demolished, of my grandfather, whose name I carry. He was changed from a vigorous department store owner to a stricken, ailing clerk. He died of a heart attack at age 55, an immigrant in South Carolina. My mother says he never recovered from the news that his mother had perished in Theresienstadt.

My mother's experiences are not unusual; would that they were. She is unusual only in that she survived, and her parents and sister survived.

Because of her, Oscar and Emilie Schindler were not the first righteous gentiles I ever heard of; because of her, I knew about Frau Duhng. Frau Duhng was the Christian cleaning lady who worked for my grandparents. One day shortly after Kristallnacht, the Gestapo came to my grandparents' home seeking Jews to haul away. Frau Duhng was the only adult present. My blond blue-eyed mother and her brunette, brown-eyed sister, then adolescent girls, were also home. Frau Duhng calmly introduced them as her own daughters in so matter-of-fact a way that the Nazis believed her and left. I am here to mark Tisha b'Av, and to live a full life, and to raise Jewish children, only because of her, as Schindler's Jews are here because of him.

On Tisha b'Av, we are charged to reach deep, to feel the loss of the Temple, to be moved by ancient history and to grieve. But perhaps we can also try to use this cathartic, healing, thoughtful day of study and fasting to fulfil a parallel duty; to learn about the Holocaust and to teach our children. Instead of wishing each other an "easy fast," perhaps we need to taste the bitterness afresh and not evade it. This is hard with kids, even older ones, because the subject is so frightening and horrific, but the older your children are, the more crucial it is to teach them.

Schindler's List is a welcome step along the way to knowledge, but it is not enough. We cannot just send our children to the movies to learn their own history. While Rwanda and Bosnia and Haiti challenge us to act because they prove to us that genocide is not only a scourge of the past, while deniers and haters flourish, we cannot grieve enough. We can only fail to turn grief into action. We cannot help enough. We cannot learn enough. We cannot teach enough. But we can start.

Jews and professional sports

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

At the turn of the 19th century, an American sociologist, Edward Ross, compared Jewish immigrants to white Protestant Americans. "On the physical side," he observed, "the Hebrews are the polar opposites of our pioneer breed. Not only are they undersized and weak-muscled, but they shun bodily activity..."

Two decades later, Henry Ford, the automobile magnate-cum-anti-Semitic propagandist, blithely proclaimed that "Jews are not sportsmen."

Balderdash!

Jews may be the people of the book, but who's to say the Jewish people, especially in the United States, haven't produced their fair share of middling to great amateur and professional athletes?

As historian Peter Levine suggests in Ellis Island to Ebbets Field (Oxford University Press, $35), sport was one of the avenues of integration into the mainstream for the sons of Jewish immigrants. "The vast majority of these people eagerly embraced American opportunity and experience. For many, this included a love of sport." And, he might have added, a direct involvement in sport. This was particularly true in the first four decades of this century, when Jewish Americans were struggling for acceptance.

Jewish boys made their mark in a number of sports, notably basketball, baseball and boxing.

Basketball seemed exceedingly appealing. Writing in the 1930s, when racial stereotypes were prevalent, Paul Gallico, sports editor of the New York Daily News, noted that Jews identified with basketball because it placed "a premium on an alert, scheming mind... flashy trickiness, artful dodging and general smart aleckness."

The two figures who stand head and shoulders above all others in basketball were Nat Holman and Red Auerbach.

Born in New York City's Lower East Side, Holman was head coach of City College of New York for 36 years and a member of the Basketball Hall of Fame.

Auerbach, whose father Hymie was born in Minsk, led the Boston Celtics to nine National Basketball Association championships between 1956 and 1966 before becoming the club's general manager and then president.

By Levine's estimate, 115 Jews played major league baseball from 1871 to 1980. From 1930 to 1955, the peak years of Jewish participation, an average of eight players competed each year. Twelve players, the most in any single season, played in 1936.

The game produced journeymen like Buddy Meyer, Harry Danning, Sid Gordon and Phil Weintraub, as well as that oddity, Moe Berg, who received far more attention in the press for his mind than his baseball talent.

Berg, a Princeton graduate, could read the Torah in Hebrew at the age of 10, and was fluent in seven languages. A catcher, he batted .288 in his best year for the Chicago White Sox in 1929. When his 15-year career ended, he studied law at Columbia and languages at the Sorbonne.

In terms of sheer athletic ability, the greatest Jewish baseball players were Hank Greenberg and Sandy Koufax.

In 1935, Greenberg won the American League's most valuable player award. Three years later, he hit 58 home runs, two short of Babe Ruth's record. He led the Detroit Tigers into the World Series four times. He had a lifetime batting average of .313 in a 13-year career interrupted by four years of military service.

Koufax pitched the Los Angeles Dodgers to three National League pennants and two World Series victories. He won 129 games and lost only 47. In 1963, his best year, he compiled a 25-5 record, throwing 11 shutouts. At 37, he was the youngest player ever to be inducted into the Baseball Hall of Fame.

Levine claims that players born between 1900 and 1925 came from predominantly lower middle-class or working-class families, while those who made it to the majors in more recent times grew up in suburban middle-class homes.

Before 1916, most title contenders in boxing were Irish, German or Italian. But within 12 years, Levine writes, Jewish fighters comprised the largest total.

Jewish boxers, running the gamut from Maxie "Slapsy" Rosenbloom to Barney Ross, engendered ethnic pride. And boxing matches, he adds, became community events.

Benny Leonard, the lightweight champion for eight years, inspired fierce pride. As Budd Schulberg, the novelist, put it: "To see him climb into the ring sporting the six-pointed Jewish star on his fighting trunks was to anticipate sweet revenge for all the bloody noses, split lips and mocking laughter at pale little Jewish boys who had run the neighborhood gauntlet."

Arthur Brisbane, the Hearst columnist, noted that Leonard's reputation as a tough boxer, and his participation in exhibition bouts to raise money for Catholic charities, did "more to conquer anti-Semitism than 1,000 textbooks."

Levine focuses on three football stars — Benny Friedman, Marshall Goldberg and Sid Luckman.

Friedman, an All-American, quarterbacked the University of Michigan to consecutive Big Ten championships in 1925 and 1926. The legendary sportswriter, Grantland Rice, compared him favorably with his immortal contemporary, Red Grange.

Goldberg, also an All-American, helped the University of Pittsburg win the national title in 1937. Luckman, the Columbia quarterback, went on to lead the Chicago Bears to four National Football League championships between 1940 and 1946.

In tennis, Levine chronicles the exploits of Dick Savitt, the first Jew to win the men's singles title at Wimbledon. In golf, he showcases the talents of Amy Alcott, who has captured many tournaments. And in swimming, he features Mark Spitz, the swimmer who won seven gold medals at the 1972 Olympic Games in Munich, marred by the murder of 11 Israeli athletes.

Clearly, Jews have had a significant impact on sport in the United States (not to mention other countries). Nevertheless, there is an enduring myth that Jews and sport are incompatible. Shortly before his death in 1988, Dick Shawn, the Jewish comedian, cracked that he had recently finished a book on great Jews in American sport. Not surprisingly, he claimed, it was very short.

It would have been interesting to know which book he had read. Had he lived to peruse Ellis Island to Ebbets Field, he would have realized that Jews have played a stellar role in American sport.

Marshall Goldberg, All-American.

Mideast Analysis

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Is race important in the Arab world? It's a complex question. Miscegenation, the result of slavery, has been a fairly common phenomenon in the Islamic fold. But is it correct to conclude that Arab society has been a racial utopia? Arab spokesmen are fond of making this claim, while denouncing Zionism as intrinsically racist.

Bernard Lewis, a pre-eminent historian, examines this little-discussed aspect of Islam in Race and Slavery in the Middle East (Oxford University Press, $15.50). In an erudite survey from late antiquity to the 20th century, he demonstrates that while theological Islam rejected discrimination based on race, prejudice often prevailed in day-to-day practice.

In the Koran, the sacred text of Islam, "race is obviously not a burning issue." Indeed, Lewis writes, the Koran expresses no racial or color prejudice. But more often than not, Muslims disregarded the strictures of Islam.

Islam did not oppose racial intermarriages. But evidence suggests that marriages between black men and white women were frowned upon. In early Islam times, for example, the Arabs looked down on the offspring of black slave mothers, regarding them as inferior to the offspring of free-born Arab women. Yet the stigma was attached to the status, not the race, of the mother, and it affected the sons of white as well as black concubines.

Before long, however, a distinctive color prejudice appeared in Arab societies, as the association of blackness with slavery and whiteness with freedom and nobility became common. Even today, Lewis observes, a North African man with Negroid features, even of the highest social status, is sometimes described as "the son of a slave woman."

Miscegenation was socially tolerated, but it was a one-way road. It was unthinkable for an Arab, Berber, Turk or Persian to consent to his daughter marrying a black African, slave or freeman. But marriages between a black servant woman and an Arab man could and did take place. There was one glaring exception. Among Bedouin tribes, marriages with blacks were considered shameful. Even the use of black concubines was not acceptable.

Arabs and race

Arab slave traders made no distinction between white and black slaves. The slave trade was a business, pure and simple. But the owners of slaves viewed their chattal through different eyes. Whereas white slaves could become generals, provincial governors and even founders of dynasties, this hardly happened with black slaves. Blacks were imported for domestic service, with African women often kept as concubines.

But as the source of white slaves dried up, black slaves were increasingly given tasks and positions to which they could previously not aspire. After the 19th century, Lewis notes, black slaves — and more frequently black free men — occupied important positions and often exercised great power, particularly in the Arabian peninsula.

Nevertheless, Lewis points out, the literature and folklore of the Islamic world are replete with racial stereotypes.

The black's physical appearance is described as ugly, distorted and monstrous. He is considered frivolous. On a positive note, the black is portrayed as brave, generous and musical, with a strong feeling for rhythm.

Sexual stereotypes abound. A common theme is the black's immense potency and unbridled sexuality. Examples of this are found in The Thousand and One Nights. According to Lewis, a great deal of Arab poetry displays a prurient interest in black females, as one finds in anti-Semitic European tracts about Jewish women.

Lewis argues, quite convincingly, that "the myth of Islamic racial innocence" was a Western creation, the product of Enlightenment philosophers who mythologized and idealized Islam as a way of attacking dogmatic Christianity.

Western Jews, newly and still imperfectly emancipated in the 19th century, played on this myth — hoping to usher in an age of complete tolerance and acceptance.

The human drama in Israeli courts

By CARL ALPERT

There is no greater source of human interest stories than the courts of justice. Israel's courts are no exception.

The Bride had a Bellyful. A 23-year-old Herzlia bride sued for divorce on the grounds that on her wedding night her husband fell madly in love with the belly dancer who had been brought in to entertain, and had been pursuing her ever since.

Shul Business. Judge Menahem Neeman of the Haifa court heard the evidence from the angry litigants, all worshippers at the Bat Galim Sephardi synagogue, and ruled: "No, Avraham Biton had no right to interrupt the chazan with frequent corrections and criticism during the prayer service, and he was ordered to desist. At the same time, the synagogue committee was told it had no right to ban Biton from the services if he remained quiet hereafter. A sign has been posted in the synagogue: "It is forbidden to disturb the cantor during services."

Were These the Still Waters? Sam Ezra, a resident of Petach Tikvah, was arrested, and 22,000 bottles of water in his possession were impounded. They were labelled "Holy Water," and Judge Teeman instructed that the contents be given laboratory checks to ascertain if they came from the Jordan River or from the local spigot.

A Discriminating Burglar. The judge in the Haifa court heard the evidence: Shmuel Hamu threw a stone through a plate glass window of a local bank, entered, and helped himself to 40 packs of his favorite cigarettes which he found in one of the cupboards, and then left. No, he was not a bank robber. He just had an uncontrollable impulse. The judge gave him a four-month suspended sentence and urged that he control himself hereafter.

Marriage up in smoke

Their Marriage Went up in Smoke. A 40-year-old husband from Ness Ziona asked the rabbinical court in Rehovot to grant a divorce because, in violation of a written promise his wife had given him to refrain from smoking, she had returned to the noxious weed.

Getting to the Heart of the Matter. Six judges of the Tel Aviv Municipal Court filed suit in the Jerusalem Labor Court against Israel's National Insurance, Bituach Leumi, demanding that the heart attacks which they had all suffered be recognized as ailments incurred as a result of their work, and hence qualifying them for appropriate compensation.

"Keep Him Out, and Them Too." The District Court in Tel Aviv heard a request from a woman that her husband be barred from entering her home, at least for a few months, on the grounds that he was resorting to unusual tactics to compel her to agree to a divorce. Lately he had begun bringing mice into the house, knowing how much this would disturb her.

A matter of Penmanship. A three-judge bench in the Beersheba District Court voided a judgment against Chaim Rachamim, who had been found guilty of traffic violations. The grounds: the minutes of the trial, as recorded by hand by the judge, were written in an almost illegible handwriting. However, the case was returned to the lower court for a rehearing.

A Minor Difference. The newspaper Haaretz published a correction of its previous report of a libel case. The passage in the press report should have read, "the fundamental rulings of Judge Maltz, and not "the criminal demands of the judge."

Citing Authority. When the Israel Labor party brought suit for libel against Prof. Amnon Rubenstein, the court refused to hear the case on the grounds that it was a political matter. The Labor party attorney cited from a learned book of law to show that the court did have competence in the matter. The book: Constitutional Law in Israel, by Prof. Amnon Rubenstein.

Farkas-Himsley recalled at memorial service

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — It was a time for sadness and a time for celebration as more than 150 family members, friends and colleagues gathered recently at Hart House on the University of Toronto campus for a memorial service honoring the memory of Prof. Hannah Farkas-Himsley, whose life was dedicated to combatting cancer. She herself succumbed to the disease in January at the age of 76.

Her daughters, Leorah Kroyanker and Ruth Geva, who live in Jerusalem where Farkas-Himsley had a home, hosted the memorial service. They noted that a memorial service was also held in Jerusalem.

Kroyanker and Geva shared their warm and loving memories of their mother in a slide presentation which depicted the various roles she filled from her birth in Moscow during the Russian Revolution, through her eventful and heroic life in Israel, to her many accomplishments over the last three and a half decades in Toronto.

Among her many talents, Farkas-Himsley was an accomplished photographer. An avid sculptor, artist, swimmer and tennis player, she captured many precious events in her life with her camera.

Farkas-Himsley's family, the Aharonovitches, made aliyah in 1926 when she was 8. She participated in the Haganah, studied biology and bacteriology and received her PhD in 1946 at the Hebrew University on Mount Scopus.

Her husband, Prof. Ladislas Farkas, a Hungarian physical chemist, was killed in a plane crash in 1948, while on route to Europe to buy equipment for Israel.

The widow with two young daughters joined the Medical School in Jerusalem and was a lecturer and researcher at the Hebrew University.

She met her second husband, Alexander Himsley, an English engineering consultant, through her scientific work. The family came to Canada in 1957 where Alex Himsley worked on uranium mine projects.

In Canada, Farkas-Himsley took a position at the University of Toronto where she began researching the effect of bacteriocins on infected cells. She worked with researchers at the Princess Margaret Hospital, the Hospital for Sick Children, the Mount Sinai Hospital and Women's College Hospital in Toronto, and with the Weizmann Institute and the Hadassah Medical Centre in Israel.

At the memorial service, Prof. Eva Dessen spoke of the "morality and divine spark" of Farkas-Himsley. "We remember with sadness, but we are celebrating her remarkable life, her unique and outstanding character," said Dessen. She recited A Woman of Valor in Hebrew and Rose Wolfson read the Proverb in English.

Marva Amour, a friend who had nursed Farkas-Himsley's second husband, who also died of cancer, sang Psalm 23.

Dr. Ricky Kanee Schachter, a friend and former head of the Dermatology Centre at Women's College Hospital, who worked closely with Farkas-Himsley, told of the scientist's "combination of intelligence and curiosity, drive and persistence." These qualities, she said, made Farkas-Himsley a perfect role model for all who seek to be a woman of science.

Schachter spoke of the partially purified protein from bacteria that kills cancer cells yet does not damage normal cells that Farkas-Himsley isolated and synthesized.

Dr. Richard Hill of the Ontario Cancer Institute, who worked with Farkas-Himsley for many years and with whom she published numerous research papers, spoke of their work together.

He described her "imagination to dream up great schemes and her drive and determination to see them through to fruition," noting that she was never satisfied with her difficult quest — she was continually searching for other activities with this material.

Carol Gordon, co-chair of Weizmann Women for Science, commended Farkas-Himsley for her outstanding work as both a scientist and a volunteer for science with the Weizmann organization.

REENA ANNUAL MEETING

Reena clients Paul Cantlie and Phil Lepofsky (2nd and 4th from left) received the organization's Employee of the Year awards at last week's annual meeting. Joining them were incoming Reena chair Rob Berkovitz (left) and outgoing chair Hy Elley. Employer of the Year was the women's apparel manufacturer, Mr. Leonard, which has been Lepofsky's employer for the past six years. [Ron Csillag photo]

Winnipeg JCC lauded for special needs services

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prarie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The YMHA Jewish Community Centre has been recognized by its peers with an award for excellence in programs and services for individuals with special needs.

YMHA board president Larry Hecht, and the centre's executive director, Les Marks, were in New York recently to accept the award from the Jewish Community Centres Association at its biennial convention. Marks says that the credit for the Y's successful integration efforts goes to Linda Waldman, director of youth services, and her staff who operate and put the programs together.

The Y's special needs programs are in their third year. University students who are volunteer leaders at the centre act as buddies for special needs children at arts and crafts programs, floor hockey games and celebrations of Jewish holidays.

"Last year, we had 12 children with a variety of special needs from physical impairment to emotional problems to visibility impairment participating regularly in our programs," Marks says.

New Jewish Sports Hall of Fame inaugurated

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A new Ontario Jewish Sports Hall of Fame was inaugurated at the Jewish Community Centre's Sports Celebrity Dinner.

Steve Stavro, Cliff Fletcher and the Toronto Maple Leaf Hockey Club were honored as Sportsmen of the Year at the event which drew over 700 people at the Four Seasons Inn on the Park.

Stavro is chairman of the board and chief executive officer of the Maple Leafs, and Fletcher is president and general manager. In its 10 years of existence, the annual dinner has become one of the most prestigious on this city's sports calendar.

Head table guests included Premier Bob Rae and Mayor June Rowlands, both of whom made welcoming remarks. Entertainment was provided by singers Michael Burgess and the Good Brothers, and comedian Mike MacDonald.

Hockey Hall of Famers seated at the head table included Darryl Sittler, Johnny Bower, George Armstrong and Steve Shutt. Other NHL players at the head table included Kent Manderville, Drake Berehowsky, Rene Robert and Rick Martin.

Also present were Sue Scherer, captain of two Canadian women's hockey teams, and Uzi Lee, captain of the Israeli national ice hockey team.

Football Hall of Famers at the head table included Sam Etcheverry and Russ Jackson. Former Olympic gymnast Elfi Schlegel, cantor Martin Steinhouse and Israeli vice-consul Haim Waxman were other head table guests.

"I remember our first dinner," said JCC president David Perlmutter. "We were worried about how much money we would lose."

Instead, he said, the annual dinners have raised about $1.5 million for the JCC in the past 10 years.

Tickets for last night's event went for $200 apiece, or $3,000 per corporate table. An after-dinner auction of four items of hockey memorabilia raised $6,900. The highest bid of $3,000 was received for the signed hockey jersey of Maple Leaf Doug Gilmour.

In all, the event netted about $120,000 for the JCC, which has experienced financial troubles in recent years.

"One day at Knob Hill Farms, the butcher told Steve Stavro that if he was looking for a bunch of weiners he should buy Maple Leaf, and the rest is history."

That was co-emcee Ken Daniels' way of summing up Stavro's accomplishments since acquiring the Maple Leafs, whose fortunes have reversed themselves dramatically in the last two years.

"I'd like to thank the JCC for honoring the people who have brought the Leafs back to us," said Toronto Mayor June Rowlands.

Stavro and Fletcher received engraved silver bowls that had been designed by Tiffany & Co., a major corporate sponsor of the dinner. Tiffany vice-president Philip Taylor was among head table guests.

Five Jewish athletes were inducted into the new Ontario Jewish Sports Hall of Fame: the late Bobby Rosenfeld, who was designated the top female athlete of the first half of the century; the late Alex Levinsky, a Toronto Maple Leaf from the 1940s; the late Goody Rosen, who played major league baseball with the Brooklyn Dodgers; Sammy Luftspring, former boxer and boxing referee; and Irving Ungerman, former boxer, boxing promoter and former manager of George Chuvalo. Luftspring, Ungerman and relatives of the other three inductees were on hand to accept engraved silver trays.

Previous JCC sports celebrity dinners have honored Harold Ballard, Charles Bronfman, William G. Davis, Pat Gillick, Alan Eagleson, Irving Ungerman, Johnny Esaw, Wayne Gretzky, John Candy, Bruce McNall and the Toronto Blue Jays.

B'nai Brith lodge launches scholarships

TORONTO — Metro Toronto Lodge, the oldest B'nai Brith lodge in Ontario, has announced the formation of three new scholarships in honor of its 75th anniversary this year.

Two of the scholarships will be awarded annually to the undergraduate student who writes the best essay on a Canadian Jewish Studies theme in any course at each of the University of Toronto and York University. The third scholarship will be administered directly by Metro Toronto Lodge and will be awarded to a Toronto-area student who has shown commitment to building a strong Jewish community.

Formed in 1919, by the 1940s Toronto Lodge had grown so large that groups broke off to form new lodges. Over the past ten years, four of those lodges, Empire, Forest Hill, Eglinton and Sportsmen's, again merged with Toronto to form Metro Toronto lodge, with over 500 members.

Over the years, the membership ranks of the lodge have included prominent community members — senators, judges and rabbis. Five national presidents of B'nai Brith Canada have come from the Lodge, as does a current international vice-president.

According to lodge president, Allen Felg, "Our lodge has shown a long-standing commitment to the youth of our community. We endowed the original Hillel House and helped start the B'nai Brith summer camp."

"Today we continue to support youth and education," added lodge treasurer Jack Rowan. "We regularly support the Jewish Students' Union and BBYO, and this year we are committed to supporting Shearim and Zarenu schools."

"Over the years we have endowed scholarships at Israeli universities, but because this is our 75th anniversary, we wanted to do something special in our community. That is why we have formed these three local scholarships which not only help local kids but also help to promote the study of Canadian Jewry," said Charles Chaplin, lodge vice-president.

Metro Toronto Lodge celebrates its 75th anniversary on August 18 with a gala dinner featuring Mitchel Sharpe, special aide to Prime Minister Jean Chretien.

Letters of Application for the scholarship awarded for community service should be sent to 7 Towngate Drive, suite No. 803, Thornhill, Ontario L4J 7Z9 before August 7.

CDA Honors Glatt

TORONTO — The Ontario chapter of the Canadian Diabetes Association (CDA) recently presented an appreciation award to Shirley Glatt for "significant voluntary support in the fight against diabetes."

Esther Schwartz, the founder of the Jewish chapter of CDA told The CJN that "Shirley is the backbone of our chapter and puts in many, many volunteer hours cheerfully and always with a smile. She certainly deserves an appreciation award."

The presentation was made to Glatt by Paul McCarten, CDA regional director, at the annual general meeting of the Metro branch of CDA, held recently at the YMCA on Grosvenor Street.

Glatt, whose diabetes was diagnosed 12 years ago and is insulin dependent, was born in Montreal and attended Baron Byng High School. She and her husband Henry moved to Toronto in 1978. They have three children and five grandchildren.

After the sudden onset of diabetes, Shirley says her life changed. She became "more cautious and introspective about what was going on with my body. I had to follow the diabetes diet very carefully and was always prepared with my medication." She explains that the three elements in diabetes control are medication, diet and exercise.

She recalls that she first read about the Jewish chapter of CDA in The CJN. "I attended a meeting, offered my help and I have been active ever since." This has also led Shirley to assist with many events sponsored by the CDA. She served as president of the Jewish chapter from 1989 to 1991 and is presently the corresponding secretary.

She is a volunteer at the Diabetes Education Centre at North York Branson Hospital. She says that Anna Brundage, the nurse/educator and her staff at the Diabetes Education Centre help hundreds of people with diabetes, many directed to the Centre by their physician. At the Centre, people with diabetes learn to live a relatively normal life.

Shirley noted that there are more than 100,000 people with diabetes in Toronto — and the number is increasing.

The Jewish chapter meets every second month. It was established to educate the community about diabetes, provide a service beyond the doctor's office, provide a support network and help with the Jewish dietary laws.

She told The CJN that the next meeting of the Jewish chapter will take place on Monday evening, Oct. 13 at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue. People with diabetes and interested family and friends are invited to attend meetings.

Togo Gets New Vice-Consul

TORONTO — Toronto lawyer John H. Pollock is the new vice-consul of the Republic of Togo, one of the first African countries to establish diplomatic relations with the State of Israel.

Pollock's jurisdiction as vice-consul extends to Ontario and Manitoba. His responsibilities include the areas of communications and culture.

Pollock was appointed to the post by Kossivi Osseyi, Togo's ambassador to Canada. Pollock was introduced to Osseyi by his client and fellow vice-consul Paul Tuz, president of the Better Business Bureau of Metropolitan Toronto.

Togo, which gained its independence from France in 1960, has more than 3.5 million people. It has some 40 ethnic groups, 250,000 Christians and 50,000 Muslims. More than two-thirds of Togolese are under the age of 30.

"I believe that Africa is re-awakening from many years of slumber and is undoubtedly today the most exciting continent for economic and social development," Pollock said. "It would be in the best interest of all peoples to assist and encourage the evolutionary changes which are now underway."

Pollock was born in Toronto and attended Harbord Collegiate. He received his law degree at Osgoode Hall Law School and was called to the bar in 1955. He established a private practice encompassing corporate, commercial, business publishing and entertainment law. He was appointed Queen's Council in 1981.

Fluent in French, Spanish and Yiddish, Pollock said he will get by in Togo, where French is the official language. The West African country, roughly the size of Nova Scotia, is renowned for its coffee, cotton and other agricultural products. Pollock said he is "optimistic" about the economic development of Togo and neighbouring states like Ghana and Burkina Faso (formerly Upper Volta).

"The needs of the African nations are very real and must be realized," he said. "This affords the opportunity of building a bridge of understanding between Africa and Israel with its technological expertise. Since Israel and Togo have diplomatic relations, it is hopeful that their trade and economic ties will become strong."

As a member of the consular corps, Pollock believes he is in a unique position to forge alliances with Israel and many underdeveloped African states. He plans to visit Togo, Ghana, Benin and Niger in November.

Pollock is a member of the Ontario Hospital Appeal Board, served as president of the Beth Tzedec Congregation, and is on the board of the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care. Pollock is looking to send used hospital equipment to Togo.

York Centre Receives $250,000

TORONTO — Liberal MP Art Eggleton is taking care of business back home by sending $250,000 in summer job creation funds to his riding of York Centre.

The money, allocated under the Summer Employment Experience Development (SEED) program, will be used to create 96 summer jobs for students.

Thirteen of those jobs have been created in local Jewish organizations.

B'nai Brith Canada has hired eight students to help with research and fundraising, confirmed summer program coordinator Paul Marcus, up from three students the previous summer. Each student will be paid the minimum hourly wage of $6.70. SEED funding given to B'nai Brith was $29,148.

Also on the receiving end was Camp Moshava, a religious Zionist summer camp run by B'nei Akivah. Director Joyce Levine said the five SEED positions have been filled by university students working as nature specialists. Camp Moshava's SEED grant was $10,340.

York Centre is a suburban Toronto riding. SEED funds across the country totalled $135 million in 1994, and created close to 60,000 summer jobs for students.

HAMILTON — A group of enterprising, energetic and "very young at heart" seniors called The Saturday Niters celebrated its 10th anniversary with a cocktail party, birthday cake, guest speaker Paul Hanover and the installation of Dorothy Adler as the new president.

Outgoing president Lee Cohen is enthusiastic about a club to which "everyone feels they must belong." It provides seniors with social contacts and a multitude of stimulating activities and its growing membership now numbers 196, Cohen notes.

The Saturday Niters, founding member and first president Sophie Berenbaum recalls, grew out of a meeting originally called by Shalom Village administrator, Sheila Berman, for the purpose of involving seniors as volunteers to "fill in the gaps in programming for the newly retired residents at Shalom Village."

Instead, however, participants at that meeting felt that there was a need for programs for "retired or soon-to-retire seniors in the Jewish community," in which Shalom Village residents could participate.

Although primarily a social club, which has theatre trips, dinner parties, outings and trips, The Saturday Niters contribute to the community by fundraising and by collecting Miracle Ultramart cash tapes.

Jewish Identity Will Only Survive the Generations if There is Jewish Knowledge.

At a time when "Jewish continuity" is the major issue in Jewish communities everywhere, Eitz Chaim is proud to be numbered among those institutions which have produced tremendous results in this area and, more importantly, which continue to do so.

Eitz Chaim Schools opened in 1915 on Chestnut Street in Toronto's downtown. From a "Talmud Torah" with seven children we have grown and developed into a major educational enterprise comprising three campuses, serving a combined enrollment of over 1100 students from ages three to fourteen.

For close to eighty years, Eitz Chaim has provided students with the skills necessary to understand, to relate to, and to flourish in a modern society within the parameters of the Torah's precepts and ideals. Our commitment to these goals remains as strong today as it did when the school first opened.

This ad is a way of expressing our genuine thanks to all the people who help us educate our community's most precious resource - our children. To our loyal and generous contributors, to our administrators, rabbis, teachers, parents, students, and of course to the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto - Thank you!

Eitz Chaim Schools Salu

We are extremely proud of this year's graduates and extend to each and every one of them our sincere congratulations and best wishes for the future.

Eitz Chaim's graduates have always been eagerly accepted into yeshivas and seminaries around the world. The overwhelming majority of them continue their formal Jewish studies well beyond the secondary school level and, in fact, continue the study of Torah throughout their adult lives.

A significant number of our graduates have entered the field of Jewish education as well as other areas of Jewish public service. Many of our graduates also serve in voluntary capacities on a wide spectrum of Jewish communal organizations, here in Toronto and throughout the world.

We are confident that this year's graduates will continue to be a source of pride to Eitz Chaim and a source of nachas to their parents, grandparents and to all of Klal Yisrael.

For eight decades, Eitz Chaim Schools has imbued students with a genuine love for Judaism and a commitment to the Torah way of life. At the same time, we nurture and develop within each child a sense of pride and confidence in who they are and all they can become.

Eitz Chaim's philosophy of education embraces a commitment to excellence in secular studies. Our general studies department is fully accredited and diverse in scope. Students emerge not only with the skills to do well in higher grades, but also with an eagerness to expand their knowledge about the world they live in.

We encourage our students to develop a sense of responsibility toward the greater Jewish community. We are very proud that this year's Learnathon, raised over $20,000.00 for the United Jewish Appeal Campaign - a 12% increase over last year's total.

It is due to the enormous efforts and dedication of the many people who make up the Eitz Chaim family that our school has been overwhelmingly successful in promoting Jewish continuity for the past 79 years.

May G-d grant us the privilege to continue for many years to come.

Stroke Recovery Group helps patients on road to recovery

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — "Unbelievable" was the only word Irene Lastman could find to describe the Stroke Recovery Group's recent dinner/dance.

Dinner organizer and a longtime member of the group, Lastman says that she was amazed to see some people who were in a wheelchair last year, up and dancing at the party held at Adath Sholom Synagogue. "You cannot imagine how difficult it was for some of these people to get to their first meeting, so to see them here, dancing and enjoying themselves is really a miracle."

Lastman, who spent seven months in hospital after suffering a stroke about 12 years ago, says that the first place she went after being released was the Jewish Community Centre's Stroke Recovery Group, which meets three times a week. "I wanted to swim, so a volunteer put a tube around my leg and swam with me. One day, I was in the water and swimming before I realized that I was not wearing the tube. That is how far my recovery had come."

Veronica Rambas, group coordinator, says that the group plays a large role in helping stroke patients recover. "It is a tremendous effort for some people to get to a meeting, but thanks to a loyal, hard-working group of volunteers who do such things as teach exercise classes and help swim, these people start on the road to recovery."

She says that group members also look out for each other, and get on the phone as soon as they notice someone has missed some meetings. A Sunshine Fund, coordinated by member Leon Rochman, is used to send get-well or any type of greeting cards to other members. "It is not just an exercise group, it is also a social club. Members look forward to coming out to see their friends. They make a commitment when they join."

Lastman says that to see people such as Henry and Bebi Finkelstein, both 92 years old, attend the dinner, was to her, "overwhelming. We are talking about a lot of people who do not leave their homes except to come to the group. To call Wheel Trans, get dressed up and come out to a dance is just unbelievable."

Spirits throughout the evening were high. The dinner began with everyone holding hands and singing Its a Wonderful World, went on to see the group enjoy a rousing rendition of Hokey-Pokey, and continued with member Al Zigelstein singing accompanied by musician Boris Neiman.

Lastman says that the dinner was made possible in part by generous donations from Steeles College Memorial Chapel and Wingate branch, Royal Canadian Legion."

Historic Victoria synagogue to hold tours this summer

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — The historic Congregation Emanu-El synagogue will open its doors this summer for public tours. The first synagogue built in Western Canada, Emanu-El is the oldest one in continuous use in Canada.

Tours will be held Tuesdays at 7 p.m. and Thursdays at 11 a.m. The history and customs will be explained to visitors by knowledgeable guides from the Jewish community.

Special tours will be held at 2 p.m. on August 14, 21 and 28, to accommodate visitors to the Commonwealth Games.

"The tours are as extensive as people want them to be," said Michael Goldberg, a synagogue officer. "They will be conducted by lay people who are completely familiar with the practices and history."

Although the Victoria Jewish community was once second in size only to Montreal's, there are only about 2,200 Jews on Vancouver Island now, mainly in Victoria, said Goldberg. He added that the Jewish population "has always been small, but steady."

The Jewish Community Centre's snack bar, usually closed during the summer, will be open during the Commonwealth Games, August 18-28. The centre is near the University of Victoria, site of many of the Games activities.

Vic and Sharon Moncarz (seen in forefront) are seen with other participants of the Mission With A Difference as they finish their ascent to the Mount Scopus campus of Hebrew University.

Bike ride aids Hebrew University

TORONTO — Thirty-eight people participated in Mission With A Difference, a nine-day bicycle ride through Israel which raised more than $100,000 for the Hebrew University's Faculty of Dental Medicine.

"Everyone had a great time even though it was a lot of hard work. It seemed as though we were always going uphill with the wind in our faces but it was well worth it," says oral and maxillofacial surgeon Vic Moncarz of Toronto, who initiated Mission With A Difference.

"The Mission exceeded our expectations from many perspectives," he adds. "As well as raising money for the Hebrew University, we also raised awareness of the University and Israel. The small number of participants developed a special closeness right away. Although most of us had visited Israel before, this trip was extra special because the riding allowed us to become one with the land. We saw parts of Israel we would never see from a tour bus."

Riders came from Toronto, Montreal, Ottawa, Philadelphia and Vail. They ranged in age from late 20s to one extremely fit 75-year-old Philadelphian, Stan Tuttleman. "The ride was tougher than I thought," he said.

The bikers visited a number of scenic and historic sites in Israel, such as the ruins of Beit She'an, a Roman and Byzantine city destroyed by an earthquake in 749 AD, and Neot Kedumim, the only biblical landscape reserve in the world.

Thirteen Canadian students studying at the Hebrew University joined the riders for part of the mission.

The bike ride culminated on the Mount Scopus campus of the Hebrew University. Bikers were received by Moshe Arad, vice-president of the University and Prof. Adam Stabholz, dean of the Faculty of Dental Medicine. Certificates of achievement were presented to all the participants at a festive closing dinner which was attended by Canada's ambassador to Israel Norman Spector.

MATH AND TZEDEKAH

The Leo Baeck Day School grade 2 and 3 classes have been collecting "pop tops" to help buy a wheelchair for a child in need. Grade 2A and their teacher Gail Broudie used this tzedekah project to enrich their math program. They first estimated the total number of tops, then made groups of ten, then hundreds. They learned how many tens in a hundred and how many hundreds in a thousand. They were excited when they counted the total to be 6,763.

The decision is personal. . .

Synagogue affiliation, plot registration and cemetery management in no way limit the freedom to call any particular funeral home, despite reports of misinformation to the contrary. As everyone should know, the decision regarding burial arrangements belongs exclusively and appropriately to the bereaved family, and to no one outside it.

The choice is obvious.

Within the narrow choice there's a clear and indisputable difference. Every senior director at Benjamin's has a wide advantage in years of experience and training. The ability to explain Jewish laws and traditions in depth, the network of professional relationships to count on in unexpected or personal situations and the supervision over sensitive details continuously justify the high regard for Benjamin's as an institution in this community.

By taking their own decisions in hand, and calling upon Benjamin's, families are indicating an uncompromising degree of quality-consciousness for themselves and the memory of a loved one.

OJC elections held

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

KELOWNA, B.C. — Anita Nadler was elected president of the Okanagan Jewish Community for a second term at the annual meeting held June 15.

In her presidential report, Nadler said the organization had a very successful year, culminating in the first-ever Negev Dinner in May. "I look forward," she said, "to another productive year of continued cooperation and growth in our community."

The annual picnic was a farewell to Alvin and Lily Lander, who leave for Israel in July. They were presented with a book signed by all the members and a cake depicting a family holding an Israeli flag, embroidered with "Go in Peace."

UCS student wins Fogel scholarship

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Shira Freedman, 12, was recently awarded the Mayer Fogel Scholarship of Merit by United Congregational Schools (UCS). Shira was the youngest of the graduating Grade 7 students, because she had skipped a grade at UCS, after transferring from Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto following Grade 2.

The scholarship is administered by Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, where Shira attends classes. It was established last year by the family of the late Mayer Fogel to recognize a graduating student for academic excellence, good citizenship and a commitment to continue the study of Jewish education.

"Shira is a very serious and cooperative student," said Samuel Kapustin, her teacher for the past two years. "She seems interested in her Jewish identity."

"I love tefillah and studying about Israel and holidays," Shira told The CJN. A challah cover which Shira embroidered this year as a school project is now being used by her family.

Last year, as top student in her Grade 6 class, Shira received Israeli candlesticks from the school. She is saving them to use when she is older, she said.

Shira and her family attend services regularly at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, where Shira is a former member of the children's choir. Her mother, Karen, sings in the adult choir.

Shira Freedman

Shira is a student at Dublin Heights Elementary & Middle School. She enjoys baseball and rollerblading, and thinks she would like to be a singer, an actress or a kindergarten teacher when she grows up.

"I love kids," said Shira, who will spend part of the summer working as a counsellor-in-training at a local day camp.

Shira is the daughter of Karen and Stephen Freedman of North York.

Schwartz helps diabetics keep kosher at holidays

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — It is easy for someone with diabetes to maintain a kosher diet for most of the year, but some holiday dishes, those with high fat and sugar content, are problematic, according to the coordinator of the Jewish chapter of the Canadian Diabetes Association (CDA).

"The hardest part is the holidays because we're used to certain foods," said Esther Schwartz, who is also a kosher cooking consultant with the Canadian Jewish Congress, Orthodox division.

She recently spoke on the topic Kosher Food for Diabetics at the retirement community Forest Hill Place.

When Schwartz, 69, learned she had diabetes 12 years ago, she decided she wanted to "help others with diabetes to cope with some of the concerns that troubled me regarding the Jewish lifestyles and observances."

She remembered getting a telephone call years before from a woman looking for Passover recipes for someone with diabetes. "I had absolutely no idea who to turn to for help for her," she said.

Schwartz became a founder of the Jewish chapter of the CDA, which is now 10 years old. She has adapted Chanukah, Purim, Passover, Shavuot and Sabbath recipes and created new ones.

Her low-fat, low-sugar Passover recipes include matzah balls made without oil, a low-fat Passover pizza and an almond cookie recipe that requires very little sugar.

Diabetes results when the pancreas does not produce enough of the hormone insulin, Schwartz said. "Insulin is vital to the body, to assist us in using the food that we eat."

Some of the causes of diabetes, she mentioned, are obesity, stress and aging. "Diabetes is more likely to occur as one gets older and it seems that is what is happening with our population." She added that diet is a factor as it has been shown that North American Natives became susceptible to the condition only after they gave up their diet of grains and natural foods for western-style food.

Early symptoms of diabetes include high blood sugar, blurred vision and rapid weight loss in spite of an increased appetite. Low blood sugar occurs at a later stage.

"With diabetes, it's very important, with your food, what you eat, when you eat and how much you eat," Schwartz stressed. A person with diabetes should eat five or six small meals a day at regular times. For breakfast she recommended a carbohydrate, a protein, a fruit and a fat, although she emphasized fat intake must be watched.

Esther Schwartz

Schwartz has a snack at her usual suppertime before she goes to a bar mitzvah or a wedding, "where your dinner is generally late," and then she eats lightly at the simchah.

Emphasizing the importance of reading food labels for sugar content, Schwartz said any ingredient such as glucose, that ends in the letters "ose," is a form of sugar. "When you see a label that appears sugar free, these are your best products. They contain little or no sugar."

Sugar reduced or carbohydrate reduced products, which have a 50 per cent reduction in carbohydrate content, may not be good food choices for people with diabetes, she pointed out. "The energy value may actually be higher than foods they replace because of an increase in fat content."

Schwartz said that those with diabetes must learn to take care of themselves as "no one else will do it."

Her talk was part of a health and fitness day at Forest Hill Place, which included lectures on acupuncture, sex and relationships, and sleep disorders, along with yoga and line dancing demonstrations. Toronto mayor June Rowlands made a short speech.

Club Savoy looks back on younger days

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — They're in their early to mid 70s now, but when former members of Club Savoy and their wives recently got together for a reunion in the old College Street district where many of them grew up, for one night they were 18, 19, 20 again. They could fly up a hockey rink, slam dunk a basketball, catch a pretty girl's eye.

Club Savoy (they thought the name sounded smooth), which was disbanded 50 years ago, evolved from the Jewish Boys Club (JBC), whose headquarters were in a house on Simcoe Street with meeting rooms, a pool table, a small social hall and a library. Here they organized their own sports teams — no structured super camps — learned debating from student volunteers, presented concerts featuring home-grown talent, and forged friendships.

There were JBC branches at Clinton and Grace Street Public Schools and at Cabbagetown's Park School.

When the house on Simcoe St. was sold, a group of the boys, then 14 and 15, continued to gather casually and began to meet in their homes. But most houses were cramped and they started to look for a clubhouse. They couldn't afford to pay rent but about 1938, when they were in their late teens, an enterprising member, Murray Rumack, persuaded the board of the YMHA, which was on the second floor of the Brunswick Avenue Talmud Torah, to let them have free use of a room once a month. This, he pointed out, would encourage the boys to join the Y when they could pay the fees.

Club Savoy flourished. Monthly meetings were increased to alternating weeks and, at its peak, the club had more than 30 members. Dances were planned, hockey and baseball games scheduled, public speaking arranged. The Savoy Savior, a mimeographed paper, offered book reviews, sports commentary, "cheerful chatter," even poetry and Mother's Day tributes.

An article on the invasion of Poland became a last hurrah for the carefree Savoyans and hinted at the slaughter to come.

Club members gradually left to join the Armed Forces. They accepted commemorative gold rings from their buddies who remained behind. Eventually few were left and Club Savoy closed down.

Sam Nichols (Nicholofsky), Jack Spiegel and Sammy Kwinter were killed overseas.

At the reunion organized by Bill Stern in a private room of the Palmerston Restaurant (originally Frum's Modern Grocery), the evening began with quiet reflection as onetime Savoyans, now husbands, fathers and grandfathers, thought about the young men who never came back but helped make it possible for them to sit together in freedom around a long table half a century later.

Throughout the evening, funny stories, poignant stories, good and bad jokes filled the air.

Rumack recalled the time he approached the director of the Jewish Girls Club on St. George Street, hoping to get a few dates for the boys. He was ordered by the wily woman to bring the total Savoy membership for a "third" seder with the girls. However, because it was chol ha-mo'ed, not a holy day, the director provided a record player and music for dancing.

Another anecdote was about two members who bravely undertook a trip by streetcar to the far western reaches of the city, the Junction, to meet some blind dates. Upon arrival, they discovered that the young ladies were not to their liking, decided to stay briefly out of politeness then make a quick exit, which they did — into a closet! The girls told them to wait for the next streetcar which would be leaving in half an hour. Standing on a deserted corner until well after midnight, they found out that the last car had already left and the next one was due at six in the morning. It was a very long walk home.

There was talk too, about the tradition of ambling along College Street in one direction, covertly looking over the girls who walked in circumspect clusters in the other direction.

Old pictures, newspaper clippings, copies of the Savoy Savior, were passed around.

At last it was time to go. As they stepped out to a quiet, darkened College Street, they were haunted by the ghosts of other years: Becker's Delicatessen, Carlan Radio, Grafstein's Silks and Woollens, the Garden Theatre and the Romanian Grill where bountiful dinners were served for 75 cents with seltzer on tap instead of bottled Perrier.

ORT to honor Lily Silver

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Lily Silver, formerly of Toronto, now living in Jerusalem, will be the honoree at Toronto ORT's Golden Circle Luncheon, which will be held at the home of Florence and Sydney Cooper on July 21.

A Lily Silver perpetual scholarship will be established at the Joseph Harmatz School of Engineering on the campus of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem.

Kathleen Crook, the recently elected president of Toronto Women's ORT told The CJN that "Toronto Women's ORT is delighted to honor such a gracious lady and to thank her for all the wonderful and important support she has given ORT over the past 25 years."

David Hermelin, the president of World ORT Union will be the keynote speaker at the luncheon. Ruth Druxerman, immediate past president of Toronto Women's ORT and a co-chair of the Golden Circle Luncheon with Helen Friedman notes that "Toronto Women's ORT, celebrating 20 years of successful Golden Circles, is pleased to honor Lily Silver, past president of Toronto Women's ORT [for] her dedication and love of Eretz Israel."

The late communal leader Sophie Bennett first brought Silver into ORT in 1969. In addition to her work there, Silver was also involved in the Women's Division of the United Jewish Appeal.

The daughter of Joseph Baruch and Alta Miriam Cooper, who came from Opatow, Poland, Silver was the youngest of nine children. She says she learned about charity and kind deeds in her home when she was a child, recalling that one of her volunteer jobs was to drive her father and the late Rabbi David Ochs of the Torath Emeth Synagogue, to check on the eruv her father had been instrumental in having installed in the city so that observant Jews could carry on Shabbat.

After graduating from the Central High School of Commerce, Silver worked as a legal stenographer and also did voluntary work for the Revisionist Organization (now Herut), working for Nathan Silver, who was the secretary of the organization.

Three years later, she says with a smile, "I married the boss." Although Silver was busy raising four children, in the 1950s she was one of the founders of the Jordania chapter of Revisionist Women and became their representative to the Women's Division of the State of Israel Bonds and received the Bonds' Woman of Valor Pin for outstanding service.

The Silver family made their first trip to Israel in 1952 and formed a lifetime friendship with the late Menachem Begin and his family, as a result of Nathan Silver's tie with Begin during their childhood in Poland.

After frequent visits to Israel, the Silvers moved to Jerusalem in 1973, where Silver again became active in charitable work. Through former Torontonian, Mildred Davor, she became involved in the Sara Herzog (Ezrath Nashim) Hospital and is still a member of the board of the hospital.

Her involvement with ORT also continued in Israel and she is a member of the executive of Jerusalem Women's ORT. The Silvers established a Chair in Physics at the ORT Braude School in Karmiel.

Heat fails to dampen recital

By PAULA CITRON
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The audience enjoyed Toronto-based pianist Judith Kenedi Peleg's recital in the unairconditioned Heliconian Hall, even though the weather was sweltering hot.

Peleg performed a challenging series of works solidly rooted in the Romantic repertoire, works with a heavy rather than a lyrical edge.

A musician who opts for a firm and bold attack rather than grace or gentleness, Peleg seems willing to put interpretation above musicality. For her, the meaning behind the notes is apparently more important than the flow; she introduced long pauses or slowed down her playing to make a musical or thematic point. She also played at break-neck speed, even though it might mean losing some notes.

The emphasis on interpretation results in work that at first seems disjointed, but Peleg's idiomatic approach is also a key that unlocks the subtext and makes one listen with fresh ears. This pianist is not for concert goers who prefer their music smooth and polished.

Two major pieces on the program were largely narrative. Schumann's Kreisleriana is a musical recreation of the many moods and complex personality of Kappellmeister Kreisler, a beloved fictitious figure from the popular supernatural stories of early 19th century writer E. T .A. Hoffmann.

Kreisleriana is filled with passages that reflect the dark side of the imagination, from naughty trickery to dangerous power. In Peleg's hands, the piece shifted dramatically between harsh, agitated harmonies and light, mercurial ones. To some, the work may have seemed disjointed as a result of Peleg's deliberate choice of emphasis, but it did tell a story.

Liszt's Après une lecture du Dante takes its theme from the great writer's Divine Comedy, with its cosmic collision of the forces of good and evil and heaven and hell. The work is filled with the wails of tortured souls set against passages that thunder and crash with threats of doom interspersed with the trumpets of the forces of good. Peleg made the images unfold in dramatic fashion with playing that was never timid or tentative.

Perhaps Peleg is weakest in the lyrical mode. Both the Schumann and the Liszt contain ravishing lyrical themes, the former denoting the sensitive and melancholy side of the Kappellmeister, the latter evoking the doomed Francesca di Rimini and her lover. The pianist did not play either section with any conviction.

In Beethoven's Sonata in F major and the three selections from Brahms' Sechs Klavierstucke which rounded out the program, Peleg was also much stronger in the passages that called for a more vociferous attack.

BBQ favorites

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Barbecues have a unique place in Canadian history as a traditional place for family and friends. We all have a favorite story about a special time that stands out among all our memories and is shared often. My favorite anecdote is of the time my father set the garage on fire because he thought that one more squirt of lighter fluid would, in his words, "really get this baby going." Funny, I don't remember my mother ever letting him barbecue again. Of course this is the man who thinks cooking is putting milk on cereal.

Everyone seems to have their own special techniques and sauces for cooking out. Some rise at dawn to marinate slabs of meat, while others season as they go. There is, of course, the tried and true method of buying a bottle of ready-made sauce from the store and pouring it on the meat as it's turning a lovely shade of charcoal. What ever method you prefer, you can be guaranteed that someone else will think that their way tastes better. Every summer there are cook-offs and contests throughout the country to find the best and hottest sauces.

MUSHROOM AND TUNA TERRIYAKI APPETIZERS

½ cup soy sauce
¼ cup sugar
2 tbsp peanut oil
1 tbsp cooking sherry (kosher)
½ tsp ginger
1 clove garlic, crushed
Combine all above ingredients and mix well.
2 to 3 tuna steaks, cut into chunks
Mushroom caps, 1 for each tuna piece

Wash and dry the mushroom caps and tuna. Place 1 tuna piece in each cap. Skewer through the mushroom side first, holding the tuna in place. Leave a small space between each appetizer. Brush generously with sauce and grill on a medium to medium high heat. Baste and turn often for about 8 to 10 minutes (ingredients can be doubled).

BARBECUE GARLIC CHICKEN

2 sticks of pareve margarine
18 green onions, chopped
12 cloves of garlic, minced
3 cups kosher white wine
½ cup lemon juice (fresh is best)
6 to 7 large chicken breasts
¼ tsp pepper
1 cup chopped parsley
French Bread

Melt margarine in a large skillet. add green onions and garlic and cook over low heat approx. 3 to 4 minutes, stirring constantly. Add wine and simmer for 12 to 15 minutes. Stir occasionally.

Remove from heat and stir in lemon juice. Let cool to room temp., then stir in parsley.

Place chicken breasts in a self seal food storage bag. Pour marinade over chicken and refrigerate at least 4 hours, turning occasionally. Remove chicken from the bag and pour remaining marinade into sauce pan and heat until it starts to thicken (10 minutes), stir frequently. Strain marinade and season with pepper.

Grill chicken on medium heat. Grill for about 20 minutes or until the flesh is firm. Turn once or twice and baste occasionally. Serve chicken with the remaining sauce and the french bread to soak it up. (It's out of this world!)

Correction

TORONTO — In the article entitled Moroccan Prince Visits Toronto (CJN June 23), the synagogues of Rabbi Yehiel Benayon and Rabbi Amram Assayag were reversed.

Rabbi Benayon is the spiritual leader of Magen David Synagogue; and Rabbi Assayag is spiritual leader of Petach Tikva-Anshei Castilla Synagogue.

It was Rabbi Benayon who spoke to The CJN on the evening of the prince's visit.

The CJN deeply regrets the error.

Documentary explores ethnic tension between generations

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Mah Jong Orphan, a 45-minute documentary that recently aired on the CBC's Newsworld channel, focuses on the relationship between an immigrant Chinese mother mindful of Chinese traditions, and her grown daughter, who has rebelled somewhat from those traditions in making her life choices.

Besides earning numerous awards, the film won positive reviews in the Globe and Mail and other places.

Astonished by its success, first-time film-maker Honey Fisher says the women in the film articulate feelings that are shared by mothers and daughters in other cultures, including Jewish.

"The mother wants her daughter to go to university, become a doctor, and marry Chinese. The daughter, on the other hand, wants to be very Canadian, conform with all her friends, date non-Chinese guys, and basically deny her Chineseness. There's tension between them."

Growing up Jewish in Toronto, Fisher says she, like most of her Jewish girl friends, was subjected to similar pressures.

"There was an expectation put upon us that we would do well in school, have a profession, go out with only Jewish men. The themes in the film are very relevant to most of us."

The daughter in the film eventually marries a Jewish man, which her mother has difficulty accepting. In retrospect, the mother remarks: "If I had known what nice guys Jewish men are, I would have married one myself."

In their attempt to confront each other's idea of one other, mother and daughter articulate their thoughts as they have apparently never done before. The audience has the rare privilege of simultaneously sharing in their poignant and sometimes humorous discoveries about themselves. What is extraordinary in the end are not their differences but their similarities.

"I'm getting lots of phone calls and lots of letters from people who say, 'You have touched my life,' " says Fisher. "That's really gratifying, when that happens."

Fisher, who worked in the psychology field for years after studying dance and psychology at York University, made a career switch into media about five years ago. Since then, she has worked as a researcher and producer for CTV's acclaimed Shirley Show, Canada AM and for several independent filmmakers. About a year ago, she founded her own film company, Fishtales Productions. "I went off on my own because I was tired of being pegged as a researcher."

Using equipment from Maclean-Hunter and Rogers cable companies, Fisher made an early version of Mah Jong Orphan, then showed it to the CBC, which gave her money to shoot more scenes and have it edited professionally. As for future projects, Fisher says she has a lot of ideas for documentaries, and is now writing the script for a feature-length comedy. In the meantime, Mah Jong Orphan is due to be shown again on CBC Newsworld in the fall.

Harmony launched

Harmony plans a specific day for people to share a meal with someone they have never met, a contest in which schoolchildren design a poster and logo for Canada, and a public education campaign about the histories of various immigrant groups in Canada, including the Black, Italian and South Asian communities.

Chambers stressed that disharmony among cultural groups stems from stereotyping. If there is a problem, she said, there is sometimes a tendency to paint a negative picture of the community from which individuals originate. "Perhaps our tendency to generalize or to be influenced by preconceived notions sometimes makes it difficult to objectively evaluate the circumstances of specific situations," she said.

Some of Harmony's critics, according to Wong, are skeptical and others say they "are crazy even to try" to attain their vision of Canada — a "land of harmonious interaction and cooperation amongst all people, reflecting mutual respect for and goodwill towards all races and cultures."

Harmony's launch was attended by Elyse Graff, the national executive director of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews.

Everyone, including children, can join Harmony Movement free of charge. For information call Pauline Tong (905) 940-2823.

Visit to Holocaust Centre leads to family reunion

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A tile in the Hall of Memories at the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre recently brought together two cousins for the first time in 50 years.

Elisa Bederman, 68, and Tamar Berman, 66, were two of thousands of Hungarian Jews deported to Auschwitz-Birkenau in 1944. After the war they lost touch.

Then last month, while waiting for her husband Sam at the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre (HEMC), Bederman glanced over the tiles inscribed with names of people who perished in the Holocaust.

Her uncle's name, Henrik Schwartz, suddenly leaped out at her.

"I got terribly excited," Bederman recalled. "As I was reading the names of [his] children, I recognized one of them was missing."

Tamar Berman

Bederman (nee Schwartz) assumed the missing name belonged to the cousin she knew as Marta. She got her telephone number and called. The two first cousins spoke for an hour and arranged to meet. They had lived around the corner from each other in North York for years without knowing it. Now, they talk over the phone every other day.

"We talk about before the war, about our families," Bederman said. "We didn't live in the same town in Hungary, "but we still were a very close family."

Berman's parents, three sisters and a brother perished in the Holocaust. Their tile has been in the Hall of Memories for five years. Bederman, who came to the HEMC each month to meet her volunteer husband, said she always looked at the tiles. "I don't know why I didn't see [Berman's tile] before."

However, it is not surprising. There are 1,000 tiles lining the Hall. "I don't look at others," Berman said. "I find it too depressing."

Berman thought all her relatives died in the war, but said she always hoped someone besides herself had survived. "You never give up hope, even if you don't admit it."

At that moment, her mother called out to her. "I just walked away. I could go back, but I didn't," said Berman. "This is a burden I carried all my life, that I didn't go back."

After four months in Auschwitz-Birkenau, she was moved to a camp in Allendorf, Germany, where she worked in a munitions factory. In March of 1945, on the way to Buchenwald, Berman escaped with two other women. Followed by an SS man, they fled to a barn where they hid in the hayloft. The Nazi searched for them with a pitchfork. "I was scared, but I didn't say boo," Berman said.

The women left the barn, finding it odd that the farmer just ignored them. Then they saw the tanks, and they were American.

After the war Berman went to Israel, where she changed her first name from Marta to Tamar to forget her Hungarian background. She later moved to Montreal, then Toronto.

It took her years to come to terms with her war-time experiences. "I blocked out my feelings to survive," Berman said. "I had to block out pain and love. I did not feel anything for 30 years."

Her cousin Bederman credits her older sister Magda (Klein) with helping her survive Auschwitz-Birkenau and a second camp at Libau, Germany, where they worked making snow chains for army trucks.

"She was the strong one. If not for her, I wouldn't be here talking to you," Bederman told The CJN.

She remembers the revulsion she felt when she got a bowl of cabbage soup with a large, green worm in it. "I couldn't swallow it, [but] my sister said 'You have to.' "

At Libau, Bederman and her sister got a great deal of satisfaction from sabotaging some of the snow chains, which were shipped before being tested. The two young women, unaware their parents had been murdered, hoped their parents would live. "This is a thing that helped us to survive," Bederman said.

Bederman believes they survived by sheer luck and thinks of it as a miracle.

"She says it's a miracle, I say it's a coincidence," Berman countered. "I don't believe in miracles."

Bederman, grateful to have found her cousin, pointed out that other people might meet relatives through the tiles. "I feel if it happened to us, it can happen to other people."

Pnina Zilberman, director of the Holocaust Education Committee, said this is the second time people have been brought together by a tile.

She urges people to put the names of Holocaust victims on tiles in the Hall of Memories. "You should never give up hope," she said. "One does not know what will happen after giving a name."

Anita Ekstein, chair of the HEMC, said the tiles give reality to the lives of the victims of the Holocaust for future generations. Speaking of the many schoolchildren who tour the Centre, Ekstein said "it's very important for them to see names. When I point out the two tiles for my parents, it makes more of an impression."

New tiles are unveiled each year before Rosh Hashanah and Yom Hashoah.

Arthur Miller's back with a new play

By GERRY MORRIS
Special to The CJN

NEW YORK — Arthur Miller's first, short-lived play, The Man Who Had All The Luck opened in New York in November 1944. Fifty years later the still productive 79-year-old Miller is back with a new Broadway play, Broken Glass, the story of a deeply troubled marriage. Miller ranks with the world's truly great dramatists of the 20th century, alongside Eugene O'Neill and Tennessee Williams. His achievements include All My Sons, The Crucible, A View From The Bridge, After The Fall, The Price and of course the modern classic, Death Of A Salesman.

The title of his 13th Broadway play, Broken Glass, recalls Kristallnacht (The Night of Broken Glass). The play, set in Brooklyn in 1938, concerns the paralysis suffered by Sylvia Gellburg (Amy Irving), the long-married, long-suffering wife, and her husband, mortgage banker Phillip Gellburg (Ron Rifkin), an American Jew tormented by his Judaism.

As reports of increasing Nazi atrocities against Jews reach America, Sylvia becomes hysterical, sustaining a paralysis that renders her unable to walk. Aside from lacking emotional and physical closeness, she is healthy (the couple have not slept together in 20 years).

General practitioner Dr. Harry Hyman (David Dukes) is brought in to treat Sylvia's mysterious, crippling disability, leading to conflict between husband and doctor. Hyman suspects that Sylvia's illness has a more psychological than physiological basis, and probes both partners' psyches, attempting to uncover the roots of her illness. Sexual attraction between doctor and patient further complicates matters. In a moving speech, Sylvia acknowledges her wasted life. "I gave it away like a couple of pennies," she confesses.

Although Sylvia's baffling paralysis is the obvious theme, Phillip and his driving self-destruction are the underlying focus. From the outset, Phillip is obviously a man with many problems. He is proud to be the only Jewish employee at the "prestigious" Brooklyn Guarantee & Trust Company. His conflict becomes more manifest when he self-loathingly states his name is not Goldberg but Gellburg, a Finnish name. He cannot leave his self-destructive treadmill and important aspects of his life wilt and die.

The play is impeccably constructed of 10 scenes. Amy Irving movingly portrays the unhappy Jewish middle-aged wife and mother. Ron Rifkin, one of America's finest, most intelligent actors, delivers an intense and powerful performance as the tragic Phillip. David Dukes is excellent as the doctor, as are Frances Conway as the doctor's wife, and George N. Martin as the bigoted boss. John Tillinger directs with depth and insight. This is one of Miller's best written plays in years.

Appearing for an indefinite run at the Booth Theatre, 222 West 45th Street.

Mort Sahl retains his shock value

By GERRY MORRIS
Special to The CJN

NEW YORK — Mort Sahl has been in the business of stand up comedy since the Eisenhower days. His extra-curricular talents have included speech writing for two presidents (John F. Kennedy and Ronald Reagan) and Hollywood screenwriting since the late '70s. Bill Clinton describes him as "the Will Rogers of his generation."

The 67-year-old Jewish humorist describes himself as a political and social satirist, which won't come as news to anybody laughing his or her way through a new one-man Broadway show, Mort Sahl's America. It's intelligentsia comedy at its best.

Here he is as we remember him, in V-neck sweater, buttoned-down shirt and slacks, sauntering onstage carrying a rolled-up copy of today's newspaper. Many of the things he says in his act are torn from today's headlines.

Sahl retains the acute sense of intellectual outrage that is the well spring of his humor. Here are some of his cynically-tinged observations:

- The Rev. Jesse Jackson is the successor to the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King because of his philosophy, "I have a scheme."
- "An intellectual in show business is like the smartest bear in the zoo."
- "A Liberal is somebody who will do the right thing for the wrong reasons so he can feel good for eight minutes."
- "I'm all for capital punishment. You've got to execute people — how else are they going to learn?"
- "Norman Mailer said that in America we kill our heroes and decorate their graves."
- On actors: "They're all liberals, with the exception of Clint Eastwood and Charlton Heston, who is busy dreaming up a military government in America some day. If he looked around him he might be happy now."

Over the years Sahl has become as adept at flaying the left as he always was at tackling the right. "Liberals tend to believe they don't deserve what they have," he says. "I tend to agree. Conservatives believe they're entitled to what they've stolen."

Sahl is one of our most ascerbic commentators in the satiric combat zone. He's someone who refuses to talk down to his audience or be pigeonholded.

Appearing for an indefinite run at Theatre Four, 424 West 55th St., New York. For tickets call Telecharge (212) 239-6200.

EYE ON ARTS

Russian Dance Company: Remember the show Russians on Broadway? After playing at Massey Hall in April 1992, company members were reportedly stranded in Toronto by their promoter. Many returned to Russia, some went to Montreal, but 14 dancers, actors, singers and musicians stayed in Toronto. They received landed immigrant status last October through the generous legal assistance of Mendel Green.

Eight members of the original Russians on Broadway cast have formed the Kalinka Contemporary Russian Dance Company, which has performed at Harbourfront, First Night, the Bayview Country Club and the Granite Club. Honorary patrons of the not-for-profit dance company include Green and Ed Mirvish.

Kalinka performed around Toronto during the July 1 holiday weekend. See them at the Dragon Boat Race Festival at Toronto Island, Tuesday, July 26 at 4:50 and 6:20 p.m.

Kayla Gets 'Em Dancin': That was the headline of a Toronto Sun article on children's entertainer Kayla this spring. "I've seen fans rush the stage at concerts before," wrote reporter Vena Eaton, "but I've never seen a crush of toddlers and pint-sized groupies not only make a mad dash for the stage, but actually climb it. Just so they could dance with children's performer Kayla during her performance last Saturday afternoon ..."

What is it about Kayla that prompts any youngster over 18 months to start boogying? To find out, see her at the Belleville Waterfront Festival July 9 and 10; TVOntario's Kid Summer on July 11; Kids World, Canadian National Exhibition (with Polkaroo) from August 19 to Sept. 5; and the Ronald McDonald House at the Metro Zoo, Sept. 10.

Kayla's recent audio tape and CD, The Purple Birthday Cake, is available through mail order from Children's Hour Productions Ltd., 430 Signet Dr., Suite C, North York M9L 2T6. Phone: 416-740-5105.

Barry Zukerman Amphitheatre: This outdoor venue in Earl Bales Park, North York, is the site of free entertainment all summer long, much of it supplied through the Skylight Theatre of Toronto. The musical drama Strider previews July 12 and 13, and runs through August 7. From a story by Leo Tolstoy, it's a compelling tale of a man and a horse. Admission is free with an entrance ticket. Box office, (416) 392-3846.

On Monday, August 1 at 7 p.m., catch The Eva Fishman Show, a perennial favorite. This year, Eva presents a loving tribute to Moishe Turk featuring Cantor Wiangort, Sarah Hertzburg, Annie Wiskin and the Showstoppers. On Thursday, August 11 at 4 and 7 p.m., hear Nathan Garnick and The Yiddish Gypsy Violin. This new musical review in Yiddish and English also features Alexei Fateyev and the Kalinka Dancers (see above), accompanied by Michael Ziskin (violin) and the Campfire Music Ensemble.

Beth Tikvah Summer Music: Lyric soprano Rosemarie Danziger, clarinetist Avrahm Galper and pianist Brahm Goldhammer are featured in a program of music set for Beth Tikvah Synagogue, 3080 Bayview Ave., Willowdale (North York), Wednesday, July 27, 8 p.m. The program includes selections of Yiddish and Israeli song to the operatic music of Gounod and Mozart.

Danziger, who has been a resident of Toronto since 1990, has sung with the Israeli National Opera in Tel Aviv and at numerous concert halls throughout Europe. Galper has been principal clarinet with the Toronto Symphony, CBC Symphony, Israel Philharmonic and other orchestras. Goldhammer, a highly respected vocal coach, is also a conductor and pianist of exceptional sensitivity.

A second concert at Beth Tikvah, set for Wednesday, August 17, 8 p.m., features clarinetist Peter Stoll and pianist Tania Lee Osmond. Tickets for each concert are $5 and are available at the door.

* * *

Canadian TV Show Goes to Middle East: Kids Can Rock and Roll, a Global CanWest television series starring the children's pop group Kideo has been purchased by Israeli Educational TV and the Arab Orbit Satellite Network. Through these two systems, the children's show may be broadcast to 23 Middle East and North African territories, reaching children and their families with nonviolent, socially responsible messages.

Kolot Gayim: Proud Voices '94, described as "an evening in celebration of Jewish lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgendered culture with performances, readings, music, dancing and surprise guests," takes place at the Opera House, 735 Queen St. E. (east of Broadview), Toronto, Thursday, July 7, 8 p.m. Admission $10 (or less if you can't afford it). The event is funded by the Toronto Arts Council.

Photos of Ethiopian Jewry: Photographer Bruce Bennett was at the Tel Aviv airport in May 1991 as 14,000 Ethiopian Jews arrived during the historic Operation Solomon. Sixteen of his photographs, on view at Yeshiva University Museum through July, capture the new immigrants with the African dust still on their clothing and the ordeal they endured still in their eyes. They're part of the larger exhibition, Beta Israel: Jews of Ethiopia. Yeshiva University Museum, 2520 Amsterdam Ave., New York.

Hard work pays off for ballet dancer

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — As the song goes, "Everything is beautiful" at the Ballet, but 17-year-old Anne Hochman, who has just graduated from the National Ballet School in Toronto, knows that there's a tremendous amount of hard work behind the scenes to make the ballet so beautiful.

"Dancing is not what people think," she says. "Backstage, it's hard work, mentally and physically. In order to get us prepared, the directors have to be really tough on us.

"It's a lot of hard work and a lot of disappointments. All the students have to support each other to get through because the pressures are really tough."

Hochman should know. Eight years ago, after studying with a private dance instructor for two years, she applied to the National Ballet School, along with more than 800 others. About 240 were taken into a summer program, and about 18 were finally accepted as students at the school. Hochman has spent eight years at the school.

In her last year, she studied scholastic subjects from 8:30 a.m. to 2 p.m., then turned to ballet from 2:30 to 6:45 p.m. "We danced six days a week. We really had only Sunday to relax."

The process of attaining perfection as a dancer involves constant criticism. "She has tremendous dedication," says Hochman's mother, Elaine, who lives with her husband and their son, Michael, in Thornhill. "You have to feel secure with yourself to accept the criticism. Every day, she would call home and tell us how her day was. She's very focused. Ballet is her life."

Hochman's father, David, is a biochemist with Intermune, a medical research company. He says he is especially proud of his daughter because his parents were survivors of World War II death camps.

"It's been a long road and it has not always been smooth," he reports. "Aside from paying $10,000 a year in tuition and board, my wife and I have paid a high emotional price. This means flying high one week and hitting a low the next. Watching Anne in The Nutcracker was one of those highs, and having her almost leave the school in Grade 10 was one of the lows."

The Canadian public has invested heavily in Hochman through the Canadian Council Arts Awards. As in previous years, she recently won a large grant — $18,000 — which she is using to finance a year's travel and study in Europe.

In August, she arrives in Holland to spend three months with the Netherlands Dance Theatre in The Hague. Then she plans to visit dance companies in Germany, Switzerland, France, England and Spain.

BOOKS

By BERNARD BASKIN

The Jew In The Lotus, by Rodger Kamenetz (Harper Collins, $26.75)

Several years ago the author of this surprising book, a poet and professor of English at Louisiana State University, attached himself to a delegation of eight rabbis and Jewish scholars that travelled to a remote retreat in North India to meet with the Dalai Lama.

The Dalai Lama, spiritual and temporal ruler of Tibet, was forced to leave his country in 1959. He was filled with despair and a sense of helplessness as Chinese invaders killed over one million Tibetans, banned the teachings of his faith and pillaged thousands of Buddhist monasteries. He and most of his ministers fled to India. In 1989 he was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in recognition of his appeals for the non-violent liberation of his homeland.

The Dalai Lama had summoned the eight spiritual leaders for a week of discussion, in order to learn from them what Jews had discovered over the centuries about the techniques of self-preservation — how to live, persevere and even flourish in exile.

The Jew in the Lotus is largely a description of the extraordinary summit between the 58-year-old Buddhist leader and a group of Jews from a different religious tradition. But it is also the story of the author's discovery of the unanticipated similarities between the two faiths, the reasons why many disaffected Jews find Buddhism attractive and his own journey into Jewish self awareness and renewal.

Kamenetz was impressed with the Dalai Lama. "I mean, here's a guy from a completely different culture, who says to the Jews, 'Tell me your secret for spiritual survival in exile. . .' Think about how that reflects on him, what that says about his approach. No one's ever asked us that before — it's truly impressive. The guy's a mentsh."

A fascinating section of the book deals with an exchange between Zalman Schachter-Shalomi, a student of Chassidism and the Kabbalah, and the Dalai Lama about the nature of angels and reincarnation. What emerges from this rather esoteric and rarefied discussion are the close mystical parallels between the two traditions.

Extraordinary summit

Another area of similarity includes the Buddhist notion of striving for complete loss of the ego and for becoming totally absorbed in the world spirit. This notion is akin to the chassidic idea known as bittul ha-yesh (annihilation of the self). As Rabbi Louis Jacobs writes, "In chassidic thought man's ego is a barrier between him and God. By forgetting himself in the worship of the Creator man can achieve self-annihilation, a state in which his desire for material things, his pride, and even his yearnings for spiritual fulfilment are all tanscended and the soul becomes attached to its source in God."

The author is convinced that many JUBUs (Jewish Buddhists), including the renowned Allen Ginsberg, sought meaning in an outside religion because they were unaware of what Judaism had to offer. "It's not really that these people were alienated from Judaism; Judaism itself was not presenting its best face or tradition to us."

Some converts to Buddhism are convinced of its claims to be the true path to peace, and adopt its precept of abstaining from injury to any form of life. This has its roots in the doctrine of karma, the retribution in later incarnations for sins committed in earlier ones. Therefore life, even in in its lowest form, is to be respected and preserved; no sin is greater than the taking of life, even though it be only the gnat or the worm that perishes. This philosophy is not unlike the Jewish concept of Tzaar Baale Chayim (not doing harm or injury to any living thing).

This unusual book, written in a popular manner, is entertaining as well as instructive. The author concludes, "I have to admit that going into this project, my attitude was something like, 'These people [Jewish Buddhists] are flakes.' But my attitude now is that maybe we can learn something from the Buddhist experience, something to help us strengthen contemporary Judaism and make it a little bit more complete . . . I am hoping Judaism will survive and renew itself, because it has something vital to offer the world."

The sky's (almost) the limit when visiting Las Vegas

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

LAS VEGAS — You gotta have a gimmick. Maybe it's a pirate hotel, a drive-through obelisk or a sphinx with laser beam eyes. Perhaps it's a drive-through wedding chapel, a man-made volcano that erupts on cue, or Siegfried and Roy making animals disappear.

Whatever the gimmick or vice, Las Vegas has it in spades.

You can bet the mortgage that in the glitter capital of the world, there is nothing too ridiculous, too extreme, too far beyond the bounds of good taste to be on offer somewhere, for some price.

Whatever the entrepreneurs in Vegas are doing, they must be doing it right, as tourists from all over the wagering world flock to the city of lost wages to get a piece of the action.

Slot machines are everywhere, even in the airport's departure lounge. On my arrival at a casino-hotel on the strip, I entered what I thought was the reception area only to be confronted with hundreds of slot machines manned by zombie-like creatures pumping quarters into them relentlessly. Lights were flashing, bells were clanging, but each person stared intently at the machine in front of them, oblivious to everything else.

Thinking I had gone in the wrong door, I went back outside into the 92 degree May heat only to be told that I hadn't made a mistake, that the check-in counter was 40 yards past the slots and to the right. Welcome to Las Vegas.

Welcome to middle America. In addition to all its other qualities, Vegas brings together the motliest collection of American citizens you'd ever want to meet.

If you don't care to gamble — no problem. There are about a million other things to do. My friend and I brought our sticks along and played golf at a couple of fine courses in the area. At one of the city's municipal courses, twilight mid-week fees peaked at $11. Only in America.

At night, there are shows galore. Siegfried and Roy's animal act was one of the most elaborate and expensive at about $80. Comedian George Carlin headlined another venue, as did the ever-popular Steve Lawrence and Edie Gorme. Spanish heart-throb Julio Eglesias was another headliner of note and comedian Jerry Seinfeld (sold out weeks in advance) was scheduled to perform later in the spring.

In addition, casino-hotels offer free lounge acts of varying quality. We saw two performers put on an excellent blues/rock show, aided by computer-generated background drumming.

Word is that Vegas is hoping to broaden its appeal to families on vacation. Those already visiting the Grand Canyon (about 500 kilometres away) or Hoover Dam (50 kms away) might consider bringing the kids, but Vegas remains a fantasyland for adults. Leave the kids at home.

TRAVEL TALK

By BILL GLADSTONE

After serving overseas in the army, an American corporal came home in 1957 and hammered out a travel guide — Europe On $5 A Day — that caused an explosion in my life and changed the travel habits of a generation of North Americans. The grandson of a rabbi, Arthur Frommer gave up a law career because travel writing held more promise. Today, 184 travel guides of diverse authorship bear his name, and he is probably among the most widely-travelled persons in America, if not on the planet. "I travel constantly. I may have the world's record. I'm somewhere different almost every week of my life."

Last week, he was in Toronto, promoting the latest edition of the excellent Frommer's Comprehensive Travel Guide to Canada. A dapper, raconteurish gentleman, Frommer has a relaxed demeanor and an assured manner of speaking. He seems to genuinely enjoy discussing the intricate nuances of the travel industry, of which he is a foremost authority. And he has a seemingly boundless energy. After conducting press interviews all day, he addressed an audience of about 130 people that evening; each had paid the Learning Annex $29 for the privilege. For three and a half hours, he described various innovative methods of seeing the vast wide world on a shoestring, gave insider tips for vagabonding on the cheap, and spun colorful tales of the South Seas and other exotic locales. Some hot tips from the celebrated guru of modern travel:

• Budget travel begins with packing your bags. "Pack light. I've seen more trips destroyed by overpacking than by anything else. Don't be the hostage of porters and taxi cab drivers. Without too much to carry, you can make a casual, relaxed search of several hotels, without feeling compelled to stay in the first one you see."

• Consider alternative accommodations such as pensiones, guesthouses, bed and breakfast houses, and small second and third-class hotels. "They provide a very valued experience. They introduce you to the realities of the country in which you're travelling. At some point in your life, you should take your courage in hand and try one. Afterwards, you'll never return to the other variety."

• Avoid — at all costs — the introductory motorcoach sightseeing tours, which are "worse than useless," he says.

• Devote a few evenings to the library before leaving on a trip — and study the history and culture of a destination, not its hotels and restaurants. "So many Americans think nothing of flinging themselves at a foreign destination, arriving like an ignoramus, thinking that someone will tell them what is there. By that time, they're too late. Those who do not acquire this important background miss out on 95 per cent of what they see."

• The cheapest destinations around include the interior of Mexico, Honduras and countries of Southeast Asia. However, don't go there only to make the mistakes of ordinary tourists. The worst type of travelling involves seeing "dead physical sights" that can best be viewed in the pages of an encyclopedia or a TV documentary.

Instead, fraternize with the natives, explore, and participate in unique opportunities for learning and spiritual growth. Frommer's list of alternative travel experiences involves ashrams, yoga retreats, health farms, feminist adventures, family hostels, Elderhostels, national language academies and volunteer vacations like Volunteers for Israel.

• Learn how to bargain. Many hotels would rather fill a room at a substantial discount than let it go unoccupied. "To many North Americans, bargaining is degrading. It's something we don't do, it's something you do in Syria." And only "chumps" pay full price for cruises these days: 30 per cent or more off the catalogue price is a typical discount.

"With our guidebooks, we've been telling people to travel unpretentiously, and not to squander their money unnecessarily. The difference between categories of hotels and restaurants is mostly psychological, and all you have to do is make that psychological adjustment. For 37 years, I've been preaching, the less you spend, the more you enjoy."

• Many "consolidators" offer deeply discounted air fares, such as Network in Toronto, Unitravel in St. Louis, and Euram Inc. in Washington D.C. Air Hitch, based in New York, sells seats to Europe for as low as $100. However, you do not get to choose where you land. If you want to go to Athens, you may end up in Madrid — which may be fine, if you've got a EurailPass.

After 37 years, Frommer is a fount of wisdom regarding travel. More about his famous travel guides in a future column.

Efficiency consultant

Antony Karabus

Antony Karabus has the recession to thank for his success.

The 34-year-old chartered accountant left Arthur Anderson Co. to hang out his shingle as an efficiency consultant in 1989, two years after immigrating from Cape Town, South Africa. "It was the beginning of the recession, and everybody needed help," he says.

Since then, Karabus and his staff of seven have helped close to 40 clients, including an 800-store fast food chain and a lumber and building supplier with $250 million in annual sales, to trim the fat and boost profits.

Personable and low-key, Karabus also credits his involvement with the Young Business Network of the United Jewish Appeal (UJA) for easing his move to Canada.

Karabus talked to CJN reporter Amy Sattin in his midtown Toronto office about the factors that have contributed to his success.

CJN: When you came from South Africa in 1987, did you feel at a disadvantage in business here?

Karabus: The disadvantage I felt was that I didn't really know anybody.

I was starting from scratch in the business community. All the contacts I'd made in South Africa were basically worth nothing. Essentially all I had was the CA and the years of experience with a good company like Arthur Anderson.

CJN: Did you notice that business styles and approaches, or even business etiquette, differed between South Africa and Canada?

Karabus: It was a little more formal here and it was much more based on relationships than in South Africa.

CJN: So it must have been hard, then, if you didn't have those relationships.

Karabus: Oh, it was severe. When I started [on my own], the phone didn't ring. I didn't make the phone ring for a long, long time. I must have been completely meshugah, insane, crazy — you name it.

[But] I knew long before I moved to Canada that I was going to be self-employed. It was a question of what I was going to do, when I was going to do it, and how I was going to do it.

CJN: So how did you fall into this field?

Karabus: I enjoyed having an impact in making companies change. That was probably the number one [motivation].

CJN: Efficiency consulting was a new field back then. How did you present yourself to potential clients?

Karabus: It was very difficult. Today I can mention "business process re-engineering" to anybody, and they'll know exactly what you mean.

When I started out, I would say to people, "What I do is white-collar productivity." It took awhile. You had to sell the concept of white-collar productivity, which took a lot of doing.

It was [also] a matter of convincing people to buy from A.K. — Antony Karabus — as opposed to A.A. — Arthur Anderson. When you're selling in a large firm, you're selling the firm. When you're selling in a firm like mine, you're selling yourself.

CJN: You said the recession was a perfect time to start your business. What will you do now that the recession is ending?

Karabus: I don't believe it's over. I don't believe companies are ever going back to the fat days they used to enjoy. I think the thing is to help companies streamline. There are always going to be opportunities.

I did think at one point, "Come the end of the recession, what are we going to do?" But that doesn't seem to be happening. We've been busier now than ever before. I've just hired two people this month. We have plans to expand into the United States in 1995-96.

CJN: Do you think smaller companies need to invest in technology to compete with the larger companies?

Karabus: Absolutely. Today I was in a meeting with a client. There was a lot of frustration with the reports we printed up. They wanted copies. Now we're going onto their E-mail [via a telephone-computer link-up]. So even though they're sitting in Mississauga and we're sitting in Toronto, whenever they want to send us something, they just [dial us up].

Think about the alternative. I've got to call a courier and pray it's going to get there on time. I've got to spend the time printing [the documents], faxing them, making copies of the disk. Maybe it gets there, maybe it gets lost. You'd be spending hours producing documents. This way you send it through the modem and it's there three minutes later.

Karabus: Slowly but surely. I have to admit that six months ago we didn't have shoes on — like the shoemaker's sons, but we are getting much better now.

[I recommend clients] do whatever it takes to get more efficient and to do whatever they do more efficiently; to get rid of the paper and work more with computers.

CJN: When you were chair of the Young Business Network in 1993, you lined up speakers and organized seminars. How did you choose your speakers?

Karabus: In my year we had Michael Bregman from Second Cup, Brent Belzberg, formerly of First City Development, and Gerald Schwartz from Onex. Bregman and Belzberg are no more than 40. It was good for young people . . . to be exposed to guys that were young and very successful so they could say 'Maybe I could also be like this.'

CJN: Would you consider yourself a successful young businessman?

Karabus: I'm certainly nowhere near the league of those guys, but from your mouth to God's ears.

CJN: But you came here, you started your own business within two years, you've watched it grow, you're taking on new employees and new clients every couple of weeks. This isn't a definition of success?

Karabus: I am very motivated and very aggressive when I sell — extremely so — because I love what I do and I know I'll do well for the people I'm selling to.

The strength of our business is the relationships. Take last summer. Instead of taking my clients out to a fancy place for drinks to thank them for their business, we had all the senior people and their spouses and partners to my house for a Saturday night barbecue.

[Success] is about building relationships. If you don't do good work, the relationships don't mean a thing. But at the same time, if you don't have the relationship, you don't have anything else either.

CJN: Did the Young Business Network help you form any of those relationships?

Karabus: If there is one thing I got out of UJA, it was that I met some good friends. You're mixing with a great calibre of person because [they are] people who give their time away for nothing, and spend a lot of time specifically to help their own.

I've done some work indirectly through people I met at UJA. I didn't pursue business there. I think what is really important about community work is that you don't go with the objective of doing anything but helping the community.

You do what you do for the community, and whatever drops out of it, drops out of it. If you get to do some business with someone, wonderful, but it must be the last thing on your mind when you get involved if you want to do it right, for the right reasons.

$30 Million Commmission

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The United States and Israel have each pledged $15 million to fund joint economic projects through a science and technology commission.

Commerce Secretary Ron Brown and Michael Harish, the Israeli minister of commerce and industry, announced the agreement June 20.

The commission is "the newest concrete example of President [Bill] Clinton's commitment to working closely with Prime Minister [Yitzhak] Rabin in creating high technology jobs and economic growth in both countries," Brown said.

On July 6, the United States will open a Science and Technology Centre in Tel Aviv to assist U.S. companies seeking to do business in Israel.

Number of Job Seekers Increase

JERUSALEM — The number of job seekers rose 15.3 per cent in April compared to March, with 117,500 people registering at the Employment Service, according to seasonally-adjusted figures released by the Labor and Social Affairs Ministry.

This increase in job seekers follows a sharp drop in the first quarter of the year, when the number of job seekers fell from 117,800 at the end of 1993 to 101,900 in March.

There was a similar rise in the number of new immigrants registering as job seekers, up 15.2 per cent from March to April, from 10,400 in March to 11,900 last month.

The percentage of women among job seekers increased from 54.5 per cent in March to 55.7 per cent last month.

A Natural Gas Increase

JERUSALEM — In the next decade, Israel will double its electricity production capability, consumption of petroleum-based products will grow by 50 per cent and natural gas usage will increase by at least 50 per cent.

These are some of the figures presented by Energy and Infrastructure Minister Moshe Shahal to the Knesset in a report on this year's ministry activities.

The survey also contains details of arrangements between local authorities and Palestinian authorities concerning petroleum product standards. Israel has agreed to permit the import of petroleum products from areas under Palestinian jurisdiction on condition they meet Jordanian and other international standards.

The autonomous areas may import gasoline as long as it is colored differently from gasoline available in local markets and is not sold here.

Bonds' lunch honors bank CEO

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — What does Premier Bob Rae, have in common with prominent Canadian businessmen like Albert Reichmann, (Reichmann International), Mickey Cohen, (CEO of Molson's), Lawrence Bloomberg (CEO of First Marathon Securities), and Peter Munk (CEO American Barrick Resource Corp.)?

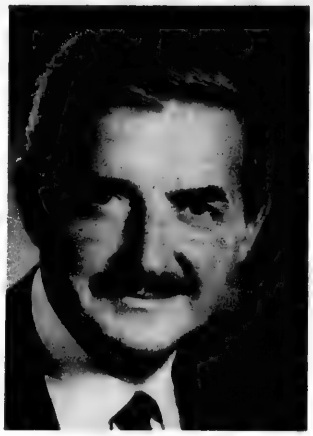
They are all big supporters of Israel and State of Israel Bonds. And they were all involved in the tribute paid to Matthew W. Barrett, (CEO the Bank of Montreal), at a recent gala luncheon held in his honor. More than 500 people attended.

Barrett, known as a humanitarian and a banker with a conscience, was presented with the Israel Peace Medal, in recognition of the effort that he and the Bank of Montreal have made to promote the sale of State of Israel Bond Notes — promissory notes financed completely by the bank for people with excellent credit.

In the last 10 years there has been a significant rise in the number of Canadian participants in the note program; the Bank of Montreal was one of the first Canadian banking institutions to endorse the program.

"The impetus helped to open doors," said Lawrence Waller, executive director of State of Israel Bonds. All the major banks and financial institutions followed the precedent set by the Bank of Montreal.

Barrett, who became CEO in 1990, has continued the Bank of Montreal's support of Israel. "He gave his overall blessing to Israel," said



Matthew Barrett

Waller, "which has given additional momentum and impetus to the program."

After receiving the medal, Barrett spoke, praising the achievements of the Jewish people, which he described as "the unrivalled contribution to the betterment of all humankind." And he stressed the importance of a strong Israel for the future of the Jewish people.

The premier, the guest speaker at the luncheon, also expressed strong support for Israel. "I encourage all of you to make an investment in a truly dynamic Israel," he said.

"Support of Israel through thick and thin should be the foundation Canadian policy," Rae said. "We should be steadfast in our support of Israel and what it represents."

He advocates free trade between the two countries. He said it makes economic sense for Canada because Israel already has a free trade agreement with the European Economic Community (EEC) and the United States.

"There are Canadian companies that are shipping out of the U.S. to move their product [duty free] to Israel," he said.

Rae, like many of the speakers, praised Barrett for his leadership and "his great sense of people."

"I can confirm that," said one woman in the audience after listening to Rae's speech. Sabina Citron, vice-chair of the Holocaust Remembrance Association said she had come to pay tribute to Barrett for personal reasons.

In 1965 Citron said she was a catalyst in getting the crown to prosecute Ernst Zundel, for spreading false news about the Jews. She was touched that Barrett took the time to testify for the prosecution.

As a banker he was able to negate Zundel's allegation that Jews were running the banks. Barrett gave the names of bankers to prove there were few Jewish bankers.

"He didn't have to go out of his way," she said. "I don't know how many other bankers would have done it. . . He seems to have a respect for all people."

This week The CJN features . . . Horvath Photography

By LORI DENNIS

TORONTO — Sam Sciarrino believes that all photography should tell a story.

He does not view his work as still shots, but rather as a reflection of his subject's mood, personality, taste and style. His backdrops are instrumental in achieving his unique effects and his photographs are never just pictures — but always a work of art and reality combined.

This is the style that Sciarrino has developed over the years, greatly influenced by the master of mood and emotion-filled photography, Tibor Horvath, Sciarrino's mentor, partner and best friend, who passed away last winter.

Horvath, known as "Mr. Soft Touch," made his mark in the world of photography by creating a romantic, dreamy look, using his own invention of a box camera lens placed on a modern camera. For many years, he was well-known for his creativity and style.

When Sciarrino joined the studio in 1984, Horvath spent many thousands of hours with him, teaching him every aspect of photography until he developed his own individuality and photographic flair. Sciarrino is now recognized in the industry for recording exciting wedding photography as a creative art.

"While traditional photography is still my bread and butter, I have developed a reputation for using unusual backdrops — many outstanding architectural features. I look for striking elegant venues such as buildings with french doors, dramatic staircases, and other theatrical effects.

"I recognize that each of my clients has their own style and personality. That's why I spend time meeting with them on an individual basis to discover their likes and dislikes and to create a look that suits them. I would never push a client to do something they're not comfortable with because the end result would seem contrived. A photographer must never pull his subjects away from who they really are," advises Sciarrino.

As an award winning photographer who has acquired his Craftsman and Master of Arts of Professional Photographers of Canada and the equivalent status in the United States, Sciarrino gives up to 10 lectures a year at photography conventions in major cities across North America. He offers photographers insights into how he approaches his work and imparts some of his trade secrets on lighting, lenses and angles.

For example, while black and white photography seems to be popular right now, it is only effective when used with dramatic lighting. "Otherwise the effect is lost," he says. Also making a comeback is hand-painted photography and upside down shots where the photographer shoots from above.

"But to achieve a great result in any shot is completely dependent on how expert the photographer is with lighting, angles and most importantly, how successful he is in getting his subjects to relax," says Sciarrino.

Loan Guarantees for Budget Use

JERUSALEM — The government will ask the United States to increase by $300 million the amount of loan guarantee funds that can be spent in the budget, when the Joint Economic Development Group (JEDG) meets in Washington.

If the United States approves the request, Israel will be able to spend $900 million on budget activities.

Under the loan guarantee legislation, the JEDG monitors how the funds have been used.

Knesset Panel Approves Zones

JERUSALEM — A special Knesset committee recently approved a bill to create Free Export Processing Zones (FEPZs) in a move the government hopes will dramatically improve the country's balance of trade and employment situation.

The bill creates special zones in which businesses will enjoy a number of concessions, including exemptions from taxes and certain labor laws, and the streamlining of bureaucratic procedures.

According to committee chairman Gedalya Gal (Labor), it will be brought to the plenum for its second and third reading within a few days.

Although many on the committee had reservations about the bill, most expressed cautious optimism. The bill creates a council of six government representatives, who will choose a franchisee to run each zone for a period of 49 years.

This franchisee will provide all its zone's infrastructure, including electricity and telephone services, though the government will provide infrastructure up to the borders of the zone. The franchisee is also responsible for bringing businesses to the zone.

Industrial Activity Upswing Expected

JERUSALEM — Although industrial activity slowed down in April due to the closure of the territories, industrialists expect business will pick up in the coming months, according to the Manufacturers Association's business expectations survey published on Sunday.

About 39 per cent of the plants reported production increases, while 36 per cent experienced declines.

By contrast, 54 per cent of the factories reported production rises in January's survey.

Gutman said industrial activity fell dramatically in the building products sector, reflecting the impact of the closure.

Similarly, the electronics and metals sectors also experienced a slowdown. By contrast, the food industry continued expanding at a fast pace.

A majority of respondents expect production to recover in the coming months.

More than 200 factories took part in the survey.

Bank lending policies to small firms are examined

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When a senior vice-president of a chartered bank said most business people are happy with how banks treat them, citing a Financial Post survey, the audience at a recent forum on big banks and small business responded with laughter and cries of disbelief.

"I won't deny there is plenty of anecdotal evidence suggesting that small businesses do experience difficulty in accessing capital," noted Charles Coffey of the Royal Bank, but he pointed out that the Royal has increased its small business loans by 30 per cent over the past five years.

"Banks are aggressively courting small business customers. You're going to see more of this," he said.

Coffey stressed that since $19 out of every $20 banks lend belongs to their depositors they have a responsibility to lend their money prudently and with fair return.

When he said he is not in favor of legislation forcing banks to change their current lending policies, he was greeted with sarcastic laughter and loud boos.

Coffey spoke at the St. Lawrence Centre to an audience of 275. He was joined by panelists Susan Bellan, the co-chair of the Canadian Organization of Small Business banking issues action committee; Duff Conacher, the coordinator of the Community Reinvestment Coalition for Democracy Watch; and Wilhelmina Nolan, a Social Planning Council of Toronto board member. Featured speaker was Premier Bob Rae, who took part in the panel. The discussion was moderated by CBC-TV Venture co-host Linda Sims.

Democracy Watch published a June 15 action alert stating that "banks did not keep their 1993 promises to lend more to small business and there is no reason to believe that they will keep their promise to adhere to their own 'code of conduct' without government regulation of their lending practices."

Conacher said six banks have control of over 80 per cent of the market share through privileges granted to them by the federal government. They are guaranteed against failure by taxpayers through the Canadian Deposit Insurance Corporation (CDIC).

The CDIC, he noted, had to pay the Toronto-Dominion Bank a million dollars in taxpayers' money to take over Central Guaranty Trust when it failed. "When you look at all the privileges and subsidies, it is pretty difficult to see anything else except that banks are the beneficiaries of a large corporate welfare package."

Banks like regulations that protect them, Conacher said, but they don't like regulations that protect the consumer. When he suggested removing some of the barriers against competition as well as the taxpayers' protection against insolvency to see how they make out on "a level playing field," the audience applauded enthusiastically.

Although there is a need for additional legislation, it doesn't have to be seen as a threat to the banks, said Rae. He stressed that "having an unprofitable, unsuccessful bank is also a threat."

You only have to look at the situation in the United States, he said, where massive public deficits are the result of the failure of savings and loan associations.

All institutions, including government, have been slow to respond to the changing economy, according to Rae. Big business created jobs in the past, he said, while the key to job creation in the future is going to be small business.

Rae says when banks talk about small business they are referring to "medium-sized, already successfully established entrepreneurial companies that need to be taken to the next stage in terms of access to international markets." Another area entirely, he added, is the world of microbusiness.

Colley said microbusinesses, which are frequently run by women, require loans that are smaller than those made by banks.

Nolan received social assistance until her microbusiness — an environmental marketing firm that manufactures, among other products, non-toxic tampons — became profitable enough to support her. She says when she applied for a loan, the bank asked for 75 per cent of the business in return for a $35,000 loan.

Nolan recalled that she got some training while she was receiving family benefits, but there was no guidance during the start-up phase of her business. Once on her own, she discovered there was no business development funding available either. In spite of the obstacles, her company is now in the U.S. market. "The province could assist in overcoming barriers," she said.

Bellan contended that the system is backwards if someone can receive $15,000 a year in unemployment insurance benefits or $10,000 in welfare payments, while "if you ask a bank for $10,000 to start your own business the answer is no."

She suggested that the government guarantee all small business lending. If five people are employed for two years they pay taxes, she said, so even if the business goes under, the government comes out even in the end. The higher the wage, Bellan noted, the higher tax forgiveness you get.

ISRAEL — Some 80 per cent of middle-aged people suffer from some degree of periodontal disease, while about 15 per cent of adults will be afflicted with chronic gum decay. It is more common for people to lose teeth through gum recession than through tooth decay.

An Israeli company has developed a tiny, biodegradable, patented chip that treats gum disease. Called the Perio chip, it is comprised of a polymer and a drug that treats inflamed and infected gums. Measuring four by five millimetres, it is designed for use by dentists.

The Jerusalem-based manufacturer, Perio Products Ltd., estimates that a dentist can insert a chip into a pocket in a patient's gum in about half a minute, without surgery. The chip slowly releases the drug chlorexidine and degrades competely within seven to 10 days. Chlorhexidine is used to treat gingivitis, a less serious inflammation of the gums that often leads to periodontitis (recession of the gums). Perio Products' chip gradually releases the drug inside the gum pockets, effectively shrinking them and killing the bacteria.

"Not only is the drug as effective as gum surgery and scaling of teeth," explains Stanley Fass, president of Perio Products Ltd., "but it has fewer side effects than drugs taken orally. At present, a dentist might prescribe chlorhexidine to be taken orally to fight gum disease. Thus," Fass adds, "the drug will circulate throughout the entire body. We estimate that the chip, which targets the drug solely on the infected area, reduces the amount of the drug entering the system by 200 or 300 times, resulting in fewer side effects."

Fass says that the chip will be approved shortly by Israel's Ministry of Health. It is currently undergoing final trials in Europe and the United States, and he expects approval by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration and European authorities by 1995.

TIPS FROM PROS

TORONTO — Do you feel you are caught in a cycle? The economy has got you down and your bottom line has not improved though sales are just beginning to rise.

You may have made a mistake today's business professional often makes — extending credit to customers who may not survive the economic crunch.

To keep your business operating, your sales department has brought in orders from companies you have not sold to in the past. You are thankful that there are orders coming in the door — but did you check their credit history? Your sales representatives say, "We have the order, we have the customer, let's ship."

Credit is a normal part of any business. Why be so concerned with checking each customer? Because if you don't, you may be giving the customer a gift.

Credit, which everyone thinks is a right, is not. In simple terms, credit is the exchange of goods and services today for a promise to pay in the future. An other way of putting it: credit is [giving] a gift, until it [the product or service] is paid for.

As a normal part of taking on a new business, you should have a well-designed credit application form to be completed by the customer and reviewed by the credit department before the product or service is provided. A well-organized credit department must have a written policy and procedures manual to help govern credit decisions.

The credit decision includes terms of sale and credit limits. This information should be forwarded to the sales department and the customer. Now you begin your relationship on the right note — everyone knows the rules!

These simple steps will save your company time, effort, and money — those uncollected accounts!

Helen S. Rubinoff is a credit professional, past president of Toronto Chapter of the Credit Institute of Canada, and now runs a consulting company.

Attention curious females, attractive, wealthy,prof. male, 35, has intriguing offer 633-3863

Male 35, looking for female companionship.Box#54106 Toronto M6A3B7 Lawrence Plaza.

Maybe now we can both stop looking! Even though we are both happy, independent & successful, within ourselves, we are also both without someone special to share it all with. Like you, I'm looking for someone who is good at sharing. Someone who is good at living. Like you, I'm looking for someone who is good at loving. Someone who is good at laughing. I'm a young man of 50, non smoker, who loves music, travel, theatre & sports. I'm comfortable with a good Chardonnay, or Praylines & Cream. A walk in the city or country roads. If you are in your mid-30s or early 40s please respond with a recent photo of yourself and a short note. "This could be the start of something big." Box 6252 CJN

Israeli bill to restrict East Jerusalem contacts

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — Israel's cabinet has approved a bill to restrict Palestinian diplomatic activity in Jerusalem following last week's controversial meeting between Canadian Public Works Minister David Dingwall and Palestinian leaders.

The proposed law, to be presented to the Knesset for first reading next week, would forbid members of the Palestinian Authority or the PLO from conducting any political activities within Jerusalem or any other part of Israel — unless they have Israeli government permission.

"It is not acceptable for a foreign government or body to be active within the borders of another country without that country's permission," said Justice Minister David Libai, explaining the rationale for the law, which would also impose jail terms and heavy fines on violators.

The proposed law — which is likely to receive strong backing in the Knesset — comes in the wake of last week's meeting between Dingwall and Palestinian leaders at Orient House in East Jerusalem.

The meeting provoked sharp criticism by several Israeli ministers who saw it as part of an ongoing attempt by Palestinians to turn Orient House into a de facto embassy.

Both Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and Police Minister Moshe Shahal said the meeting constituted a violation of the PLO-Israel accord, which stipulates that all offices of the Palestinian Authority must be located in the Gaza Strip or Jericho area.

Canadian Ambassador to Israel Norman Spector said last week that he believed any attempt by Israel to ban contacts with Palestinians in East Jerusalem would provoke an international outcry.

"With the exception of Costa Rica and Zaire, no country in the world — including Canada — has accepted Israel's annexation of Jerusalem," said Spector. "If Israel does outlaw such meetings, Ottawa will have to study the legislation to determine Canada's position."

The ambassador added that in the meantime, Canada will continue holding meetings with Palestinians at Orient House.

Spector noted that Israel did not issue any official complaint to Canada regarding the Dingwall visit and that the subject was not even raised during a meeting between him and Peres, held only a day after the controversy erupted.

In the last few weeks, Israeli officials have repeatedly issued warnings to Palestinian leaders regarding what Israel views as illegal political activity in East Jerusalem.

But the government has been inconsistent in its policy, openly toler-

Rabin, Hussein ready for summit

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israeli leaders across the political spectrum reacted enthusiastically to last Friday's announcement that Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and Jordan's King Hussein will meet at the White House on July 25.

"We are talking about the end of a state of war and the beginning of an era of peace, about economic development and the ways these ends can be achieved," an upbeat Foreign Minister Shimon Peres said.

Although the Washington summit is not expected to lead to a peace agreement, the meeting between Rabin and Hussein is expected to be a giant step forward in that direction.

In announcing the summit, U.S. President Bill Clinton said the commitment to meet publicly for the first time "reflects the courageous leadership and the bold vision which both King Hussein and Prime Minister Rabin have displayed as they work together to create a new future for their people and for all the region."

In addition to their summit meeting with Clinton, Rabin and Hussein are expected to address a joint session of the U.S. Congress.

Rabin is also expected to use the occasion to invite Hussein to visit Jerusalem to pray at the mosques on the Temple Mount.

Former Jerusalem Mayor Teddy Kollek has already conveyed a similar invitation to Hussein.

Among Israeli opposition parties, reaction to the upcoming summit was almost universally favorable, with the sole exception of the right-wing Moledet party, which has three Knesset seats.

"Every step towards a contractual peace with Jordan is to be applauded," Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu said of the planned White House meeting.

But for Moledet leader Rehavam Ze'evi, the talks with Jordan signaled the possibility that Israel might be required to cede more territory.

Meanwhile, Israeli teams from the foreign and defence ministries paid a brief visit to Jordan last Friday to make arrangements for talks scheduled to take place later this week between U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher, Peres and Jordanian Prime Minister Abdul Salam al-Majali .

BULLETIN

BUENOS AIRES — At least 16 people were killed Monday when a powerful explosion leveled a seven-storey building that serves as the Jewish community centre here.

Argentinian president Carlos Menem described those responsible as "beasts and savages." All points of entry and exit to or from the contry were immediately sealed. Flights which had left were called back.

The cause of the blast was not determined when The CJN went to press Monday afternoon.

Among the organizations housed in the building are the DAIA (Delegacion de Asociaciones Israelitas Argentinas), the umbrella communal body; AMAI, the central Ashkenazi communal body; and the Federation of Israeli-Argentina Communities.

Reports said over 100 people were in the building, which is located in a Jewish area.

Several groups claimed responsibility.

But Israeli officials said Arab extremists were likely behind the blast.

In 1992, 28 people were killed when a bomb ripped through Israel's embassy here. The bombers were never found but Israel blamed Islamic fundamentalists.

The CJN will have full details next week.

Canada to review arms sales to Israel

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada will review its policy on arms sales to Israel, says Defence Minister David Collenette.

Because of the rapprochement between Israel and the PLO, Canada plans to review its current policy, which bans weapons sales to the Jewish state and any nation involved in or under imminent threat of hostilities, Collenette told The CJN in an interview.

Collenette was asked to lift Ottawa's arms embargo to Israel by Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, who doubles as Israel's defence minister, during a meeting in Jerusalem last month.

Canada is among the few Western nations which does not allow its companies to sell weapons and related materials to Israel, because Ottawa considers Israel to fit its criteria as a nation under constant threat, and which may use Canadian weapons for belligerent purposes.

Indeed, Canadian companies sold no weapons or related technologies to Israel last year or in 1992. In 1991, Canadian firms sold $23,000 worth of defence goods to Israel, while the figure in 1990 was nearly $64,000 — a pittance by the standards of the massive global arms trade.

The Canadian sales were largely in Continuity report spurs calls to act

Young adults express doubts

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The report of the Task Force on Jewish Continuity, Assimilation and Intermarriage has been greeted with approval for its intentions and for the hard work of its members.

It has also been greeted with a decided scepticism about its effect.

The report was introduced at the recent annual meeting of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and was scheduled to be presented by its chair, Aaron Brotman, at a July 20 meeting of Federation officers.

Family life education, young adults and Jewish education were seen as priorities for the community to maintain viability.

Funds to implement the recommendations could come, the report suggests, from Federation, Endowment Fund or Jewish Agency coffers.

But the greatest doubts about the report's effectiveness were cast by the very group targeted for attention — young adults.

Howard Katz, national executive director of Network, the Canadian arm of the World Union of Jewish Students, said he thought the report was "the same old rhetoric.

Howard Katz

"The time for rhetoric is over. I encourage the community to do something [concrete]."

While Katz said he's glad the university-age population has been recognized as important to the community, he feels the situation on campus is desperate. He urged the community to take heed and provide more funding.

"It is fine to try to get students involved," he said, "but if you don't have money for staff or materials, conducting programs [at universities] is very difficult. And if I spend all my time trying to get funding, I can't do programming. It's a catch-22."

Michael Goldberg, of the Jewish Student Council at the Jewish Community Centre, is involved with Interaction, a social group for young people just out of university.

He said that while he feels the recommendations are good, "it's not earth-shattering. Anyone involved in working with students in North America would see young adults are a priority."

The problem is, he said, that $350,000 is invested annually in developing excellent leaders on the university campuses but when they graduate their desire to do community work is not welcomed by the older generation establishment.

Goldberg especially approves of the suggestion of providing start-up funds for grass roots groups. But "when it comes to tachlis, that's where the challenge is."

The proposals will take a great deal of money, and he said he wonders if Federation can provide it.

"It's great that people like Aaron Brotman are putting it in their faces. We will see in the next few years if they really do something."

Leo Davids, associate professor and chair of the sociology department at York University's Atkinson College, said the report will have value "if it will be read by leadership who are looking for specific projects in the real world, and concrete proposals."

The report will not be worth anything, he said, if it is not acted upon; previous studies on the same problem had no impact.

But the priorities are quite right, said Davids, who has studied and written extensively on demographics and the modern family, with a special interest in the Jewish family. However, he sees the situation as more desperate in Vancouver, Saskatoon and smaller communities than it is in Toronto.

Compared to the rest of the country, he said, Toronto's intermarriage rate is quite low.

"If this report is circulated to other places, like Winnipeg, for instance, and they do something, then it will have a lot of value."

He supports the report's emphasis on Jewish education, saying "education at all levels is the only area where the community can do anything." He would also like to see community funds spent on smaller projects, like creating 20 Jewish day care centres in Mississauga, rather than on one or two big projects.

Gary Foster, president of Jewish Family & Child Services, said he is impressed with the report, which he called "thought-provoking."

Its emphasis on the importance of the family, and the necessity to strengthen the Jewish family "has significance for our organization. I can see a role for JF&CS in implementing it, and we would offer our support in any way we can."

Toronto's rabbis have greeted the task force's report with the same mix of approval and doubt.

Rabbi Joseph Kelman, spiritual leader of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, said he is "glad the commission came up with the answer I expected — the proper interaction of the Jewish home and family with the synagogue, the Hebrew school and the community as represented by Federation."

However, so that the report is not "filed away as motherhood platitudes," he called for an immediate meeting of rabbis, educators and commission members to establish priorities and begin implementing them as soon as possible.

He said the report "did indeed list the reasons why we have to be concerned about continuity, and hopefully, we can address whatever the joint thinking will suggest."

Shaarei Tefillah's Rabbi Moshe Stern, president of the Vaad Haraboním of Greater Toronto, extended "a yashar koach to Mr. Brotman and his committee for a sincere effort to attempt to find solutions to very serious concerns within the Jewish community."

Rabbi Moshe Stern

From an Orthodox perspective, however, Rabbi Stern said, "the only viable solution to assuring Jewish continuity is raising large families whose children are trained in a total commitment to a Torah way of life."

Education, he agreed, is a correct priority. "If the principles of this study are put into practice, that there be a Jewish education for every Jewish child, this is a priority we should all support."

Rabbi Stern said he had the "gut feeling" the report suggests that even though intermarriage is unacceptable, somehow we have to accommodate it.

"Intermarriage is not just another problem in a series of problems Jews face. Once we get to acquiesce in it, we are sending a message that it is somehow acceptable."

Partnership proposed

Rabbi Daniel Komito-Gottlieb, executive director of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism, said that "for our organization, the key recommendation is the message calling for a partnership between Federation and the synagogues in creating and delivering services."

The Council's own priority list, he said, was similar to the report's priorities — youth programming, family life education and outreach to interfaith and recently converted Jewish families.

The synagogue, he said, is the central organization through which Jews feel connected to Jewish life, and the most "logical and appropriate place" to offer the recommended programs.

Dr. Gerald Halbert, president of United Israel Appeal of Canada, and Wilfred Posluns, chair of the Bequest and Endowment Fund of Federation, agree that their organization should indeed help fund the task force recommendations.

(United Israel Appeal funnels monies to the Jewish Agency in Israel.)

Halbert told The CJN that there should be a strong partnership between Israel and the Diaspora, which should be reflected by the Jewish Agency and local funds combining to ensure Jewish continuity.

He commented that he would have liked to see more reference to Israel in the report, especially with regard to the Israel Experience for Youth program. "That bothers me somewhat," he said.

Posluns called the report "an important document, one that is important for the community to deal with."

Endowment funds, he said, are there for the community. "If the [Federation] officers, the community and the Endowment Fund feel that that's how the money should be spent, that's where it should go."

Members of the task force who spoke to The CJN said they were relieved the long hours of effort produced a cohesive report that was arrived at through consensus and a surprising, to them, lack of acrimony.

Chair Aaron Brotman praised the working committee, who came to their task "with reasonably open minds. To their credit they didn't superimpose their own ideas."

There was no preset agenda, no predicted outcome, no interference or attempts at influence from anybody, Brotman said.

What happens now, he said, "is critically important in terms of getting action, and dealing with issues on a community-wide basis."

He said the report "will evolve, change and be revised. There will be gaps, and we must make sure the gaps will be filled.

"It is very important to get the broader community, especially synagogues and Federation, behind it. We must show that the community is together, including groups on the periphery. We must break down barriers and bring those with different opinions closer."

Mae Dalume began her stint on the task force as a student at Earl Haig Secondary School, and will be starting at York University in the fall.

The experience was "unlike anything I've ever done. I learned about the way task forces work, and about how older people think. I learned that people are people."

She said at first she was sceptical they would come up with anything that would have any effect. "That the suggestions are so tangible is a wonderful thing."

The report is "a good reflection of what we all felt," Dalume said. "It took everyone's thoughts in."

Austin Beutel chaired the think-tank portion of the study which, he felt, "provided an opportunity for a number of people [to participate] who might not otherwise have volunteered."

He found the process "helpful. We got responses of a cross-section of the community. We were satisfied to see the response, and that we were able to provoke discussion."

Beutel said he is especially pleased the report "gives a number of opportunities for synagogues to take the initiative and apply for funding. I support the conclusion which identified synagogues as a major conduit to continuity, and urge them to take advantage if the conclusions are approved by Federation."

Federation president Bernie Ghert would not comment on the report until officers examined it July 20. He did however acknowledge the time and effort put into the report, and said the members took it very seriously. "It was not put together quickly or lightly."

School funding receives setback

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Parents with children in Jewish day schools recently suffered another setback in their bid to obtain government funding for their children's education.

In a unanimous 5-0 decision, the Ontario Court of Appeal ruled that the government of Ontario is not required by the Charter of Rights and Freedoms to finance religious education "for all the diverse religious groups within Ontario."

The decision leaves in place the current system which sees public and Roman Catholic schools receive full government funding while Jewish, Protestant and other religious schools rely on tuition fees and financial support from their communities.

Full tuition fees can reach as high as $7,000 per student for a high school education.

Five parents with children in Jewish day schools, along with four parents with children in Protestant schools, launched the appeal. They were supported by Canadian Jewish Congress and the Ontario Alliance of Christian School Societies (OACSS).

The appeal court decision came as a disappointment to Murray Segal, chair of the Ontario Jewish Association for Equity in Education, a Congress committee charged with lobbying for public funding.

The decision allows Ontario "to continue practising inequality and religious discrimination," Segal said. "By rejecting [the parents'] appeal, the court has allowed Ontario to be the only jurisdiction [in Canada] that gives special rights to one religious group while denying it to others."

Segal said the committee is studying the decision and may appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Adrian Guldemond, executive-director of OACSS, said the decision "gives the impression that the Charter does not apply to education." He said he was disappointed that the court "brushed aside" minority rights and accepted the arguments of the attorney general in favor of the status quo.

Chief Justice Charles Dubin, who wrote the decision, rejected arguments that the current practice violates the Charter's guarantees of freedom of religion.

That right "involves the freedom to pursue one's religion or beliefs without government interference and the entitlement to live one's life free of state-imposed religions or beliefs," he wrote. "It does not provide an entitlement to state support for the exercise of one's religion."

Toronto JCC gets last minute reprieve

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The cash-strapped Jewish Community Centre (JCC) used up one of its nine lives last week as it narrowly avoided the possible closure of its doors due to unpaid bills totalling between $200,000 and $300,000.

As a July 15 deadline approached, officials of the JCC were scrambling to come up with a plan to satisfy three of its key creditors — utilities companies that provide water, electricity and gas.

The third of the companies, Consumers Gas, finally gave approval to a new arrangement late on the 15th. The new deal includes partial payment of the debts, said Howard English, a spokesman for the JCC and the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

"Money was made available to the JCC to make renewed arrangements," he said.

Although he declined to say whether the Federation or others had assisted the JCC in making the last-minute deal, English did say that "the Federation has taken on the responsibility to try to help extricate the JCC from this financial crisis."

Allan Reitzes, executive director of the Federation, said it would be inappropriate to comment in greater detail before a July 20 meeting of Federation officers, in which they will discuss a modified version of the plan which would see the Federation purchase the JCC's North branch on Bathurst Street.

Under terms of an agreement that had been negotiated last May and was to be signed by the end of June, the Federation was to obtain ownership of the land for $5 million, $4.5 million of which was to go towards paying down the JCC's bank debt of $9.5 million. The remaining $500,000 was to go for operating expenses.

In addition, the community Endowment Fund was to lend an additional $1.4 million to help pay the JCC's other debts, and the members at the Bloor Street and Northeast Valley branches were to embark on fundraising efforts to purchase those facilities.

The arrangement collapsed when the JCC was unable to meet the financial commitments it had made, said Federation president Bernard Ghert. That led the Bank of Montreal to announce it was backing out of the deal.

Then the officers and board of directors of the JCC resigned en masse, conditional on a new board's being appointed, he said.

A three-person committee chaired by Helen Finder-Guttman, a former vice-president of the JCC, was subsequently appointed to oversee operations of the JCC.

Ghert said the earlier deal fell through because it was found that "the JCC owes more money than had been thought. No one knows how much."

He said each week brings revelations of new sums owing to creditors.

Finder-Guttman acknowledged that "our books were in a mess. They were in quite a disastrous state and it's taken months to unravel them. [We've] found invoices that haven't been paid dating back to 1992.

"We are having problems reconciling all the amounts," she said. "At this point we are prepared to attribute it to mismanagement."

She indicated that the JCC "is very close to going bankrupt."

The JCC owes Revenue Canada about $700,000, Ghert said, adding that the JCC had been making payroll deductions and using the money to finance ongoing expenses.

"A wide variety of source deductions were not remitted," said English. "They are being remitted now. The failure to remit was a regrettable result of past practices."

He said "the JCC will be reviewing its management and immediately undertaking an exhaustive financial analysis."

Finder-Guttman was critical of the Federation for being "an unwilling dance partner. The Federation has not been a cooperative, eager partner in this," she said. "When you go to someone for help and they're not forthcoming, they're like an unwilling dance partner."

But Ghert said the three-person JCC committee has said it requires an additional $2 million to get its financial house in order. "We don't have that kind of money to give," he said, adding that "the Federation is not walking away" from the JCC.

Both Ghert and Finder-Guttman said a financial failure by the JCC would be a black mark on the Jewish community.

Former JCC president Bernard Kamin said the JCC is "suffering from financial problems no different than other businesses in the community. To expect something different, you're living in a dream world."

The JCC was unable to collect on the pledges it had received to finance the expansion of the North branch, he said. Kamin, who served as JCC president from 1985-89, when the construction took place, said he does not believe the expansion was a mistake.

"No one could have forecast the economy," he said.

He denied the JCC suffered bad management. "There are dedicated people at the JCC, just as dedicated and committed" as at other agencies, he said.

"It is incumbent on the Federation to lend the JCC money at a modest rate to see it through. That's what community is all about," Kamin added.

Israeli refugee claims discounted

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — People rescued by Operation Exodus who leave Israel and try to win refugee status in Canada by claiming persecution against them in Israel are "staining the reputation"of the Jewish state, a prominent Toronto immigration lawyer says.

"It is ludicrous what they are claiming, that Israel and the Israeli judicial system are unable to protect the rights of non-Jews," said Sergio Karas, a member of the board of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services.

Although Karas has successfully represented many Soviet Jews applying for refugee status, he said it is his policy not to represent any applicants who have come to Canada from Russia via Israel.

One report says 140 Israeli citizens, all recent immigrants from the former Soviet Union, have been granted asylum in Canada on grounds of religious persecution, while another 1,000 are awaiting hearings before refugee boards.

"Most applicants of this kind in Toronto have been rejected, but several in Montreal have been successful," Karas said.

He described as "unbelievable" the decision of a Montreal judge on May 27 overturning the earlier decision of an Immigration and Refugee Board denying the application for refugee status of Valentina Freiberg,a non-Jew married to a Jew. Judge Daniele Tremblay-Lamer ruled that what the applicant faced in Israel was persecution, and referred the case back to another panel for a rehearing.

Sergio Karas

Freiberg and her husband arrived in Ashod in Israel in November, 1990; she claimed that from the very first day she suffered harassment, threats, dismissals and difficulty in finding a place to live.

She said their daughter was shunned by other students and was beaten up one day returning home. On her arrival she took courses in Hebrew but was unable to find work, even as a domestic, because she was not Jewish. Her landlord's brother attacked her in April 1991, over her non-kosher kitchen, she claimed. Police were called but refused to do anything.

After they moved to Ashkalon in June 1991, she found work as a waitress, but said she was not allowed to serve people. At one point, she said, other waiters pulled her into bushes and tore her blouse and pulled her hair. Their daughter was so harassed at her new school that she threatened to kill herself.

Allegations of this kind are a "blot" on Israel's good name and a denial of the civil rights which exist in Israel, the only democracy in the Middle East, Karas said.

He believes the situation is serious enough that leading Jewish organizations in Canada should submit a brief to the Immigration and Refugee Boards outlining the protections which exist in Israeli society.

"We do not accept that there is such a thing as refugees from Israel," said Dror Zeigerman, Israel consul-general for Ontario.

"There are refugees to Israel, not from Israel," Zeigerman said. "People who come to Israel from countries like the former Soviet Union or Ethiopia are considered refugees. It is the aim of the state of Israel to absorb refugees.

"They are given enough money in grants and loans to have a reasonable standard of life for a year."

Many of the cases alleging persecution in Israel involve non-Jews who claimed to be Jewish in order to get out of Russia, Karas said. In some other cases, non-Jewish partners are involved.

Canadian Jews who contribute to Operation Exodus have a right to expect that a better screening system will be set up so that non-Jews or others will not benefit from Israel's generosity and then desert it at the first opportunity.

Jewish Agency allocates $11 million to bring 2,500 students to Israel

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — An $11 million program to bring 2,500 students to Israel from the former Soviet Union under the auspices of Youth Aliyah, was announced at a meeting of leaders of the Jewish Agency (JA) and World Zionist Organization (WZO) held recently in Jerusalem.

Judy Mandleman, national president of Canadian Hadassah-WIZO gave details of the program to The CJN in a phone interview shortly after her return from Israel.

She also reported on a resolution to expand the size of the board of governors of the JA.

Under the aliyah program, students aged 15 to 17 years will come to Israel with the option, at age 17, to change their status from students to olim. Those who want to return home will be able to do so.

The students will be living in Youth Aliyah villages financed by the Hadassah-WIZO organization, as well as in Women's International Zionist Organization (WIZO) schools — Hadassim and Nahalal.

Hofim, another WIZO school, will be converted into a youth village, also for the Russians; and Ethiopian students now living there will be integrated into other youth villages throughout the country.

It is expected that a number of new students will attend regular Israeli schools to get to know the people and the country better.

The budget for the program is being provided through WZO and JA.

Mandleman said Youth Aliyah will supervise all details of the education program.

The resolution to enlarge the board of governors of the JA, whose constituent members are WZO, the United Israel Appeal (UIA) and Keren Hayesod (K-H), was adopted.

A special committee which has been studying a restructuring of the board of governors for some time, recommended an increase in the board's membership from 74 to 120. This would consist of 60 members appointed by the WZO, 36 members from UIA and 24 from K-H.

The resolution urges that the 23 added members named by WZO be chosen from "a wide range of segments of Israeli society," based on their individual merits rather than political affiliations, as has been the case in the past.

The other six or seven new board members will be Jewish Zionist leaders from the Diaspora.

The additional members named by the UIA and K-H will include leadership of large federations and other Jewish leaders, as well as "other outstanding Jews prepared to be involved in the work of the JA."

The new setup will be effective immediately and, says the resolution, "will put an end to all discussions and proposals on governance for the present term of office, ending not later than Dec. 31, 1997."

The resolution calls for the reduction of WZO personnel by five per cent a year for the next four years and for retirement of the WZO debt of $5,535,000 by the end ot 1996 — to be repaid at the rate of $1.5 million per year.

Israeli society called tolerant of gay/lesbian community

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Despite its image as a macho society, Israel treats its gay and lesbian population with a lot more tolerance than many would think, according to an Israeli gay activist who spoke recently in Montreal.

Addressing a workshop at the sixth northeast regional conference of Gay and Lesbian Jewish Organizations, Ron Dayan said Israel, particularly since the late 1980s, has set an example for the rest of the world by affirming gay and lesbian rights.

Dayan, a member of Israel's 19-year-old gay and lesbian lobby group, the Society for the Protection of Personal Rights (SPPR), said most Israelis have adopted a "live and let live" attitude towards homosexuals.

"If Israelis need an enemy to mobilize against, they prefer the Arabs," Dayan said. "Israel is a macho society, but it is also a practical one."

Indeed, the Arab-Israeli dispute has for so long monopolized the Israeli agenda, Dayan believes, that Israel's politicians have been able to "slide through" progressive legislation.

Between 1948 and 1988, sodomy was illegal but the law was not enforced, Dayan said. In 1988 the attorney general repealed it.

In 1991, Israel's labor laws were expanded to include sexual orientation as a basis for equal treatment.

Interestingly, the "religious right," Dayan said, did not oppose this revision because they were too "embarrassed" by the presence of Jewish gays in Israel.

In Dayan's mind, Israeli gay and lesbian rights issues first really entered the public (and the media's) consciousness in 1991 when a flight attendant sued El Al so his lover could enjoy the spousal benefit to fly free.

The attendant, Jonathan Danilowitz, won the court case, and Israel's Supreme Court will almost certainly uphold it, Dayan believes.

Ironically, he said, the influence of the Orthodox has made it easier for homosexual couples to achieve a marital-like status because Israel has a special classification for common-law couples who refuse to submit to a religious marriage ceremony.

Domestic partner status

Civil courts give such relationships a "domestic partner" status, a category tailor-made for gay and lesbian couples, Dayan said, since its definition is simple: "a person known in public as your spouse."

Since 1992, Dayan said, the profile of the gay and lesbian community in Israel has risen steadily.

In February 1993, MK Yael Dayan (a distant relation), chair of the Knesset's first standing sub-committee on gay and lebian rights, presided over a conference on homosexuality held at the Knesset.

To Ron Dayan, this was a "watershed" moment for Israel's gay and lesbian community from both a political and social point of view since it allowed average Israelis to learn what it is like to be gay or lesbian in Israel and raised the issue of discrimination against gays in the military.

As a result of the hearings, Dayan said, the Israeli army issued a new standing order stating that no discrimination would take place against homosexuals in terms of recruitment, training and posting. That change made it possible for gays and lebians, for the first time, to hold "highly-sensitive" positions in the military that were once closed to them.

In 1993, Dayan said, Israeli gays and lesbians held their first Gay Pride Week, highlighted by a rally in Tel Aviv that drew over 1,000 participants and wide media attention.

The recent incident at Yad Vashem, when Jewish gays who tried to honor the memory of homosexual Holocaust victims were ridiculed by protestors, was "painful" but also possibly productive because "it started the education process in Israel that the Holocaust was not exclusively Jewish," Dayan said.

Unlike North America, gays and lesbians in Israel, because of the country's small size, are more integrated into the general social scene.

Israelis are likely to walk up to a male or female couple holding hands and ask them directly, "Are you gay?," out of sheer curiosity.

The SPPR, headed by a former Montrealer, Linda Moriel, has now successfully lobbied to have sexual orientation — "Gay 101," Dayan jokingly called it — taught as a subject next year in Israeli secular high schools.

Gay/lesbian Jewish group considers becoming political

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jewish gays and lesbians in North America have the power, if they wish to use it, to influence politics in their countries, delegates to the first conference of Jewish homosexuals held in this city were told.

Beth Cohen, president of the World Congress of Gay and Lesbian Jewish Organizations (WCGLJO), said the group is regarded as one of "the most organized and powerful" in the gay and lesbian community.

This comes as a surprise to Cohen because, as far as she is concerned, the WCGLJO has been mainly apolitical. She believes gay rights groups have only taken "baby steps" toward achieving their goals.

The WCGLJO was established in 1980 and is now a network of 60 organizations and congregations with a total membership of 10,000 around the world.

The Montreal affiliate, Yakhdav, for the first time hosted the WCGLJO's sixth Northeast Regional Conference. About 140 delegates from Boston, New York, Washington, Philadelphia and Montreal attended, as well as guests from cities outside the region, such as Los Angeles, Denver and Toronto.

Cohen, of Washington, conducted a session entitled Politics and Religion: Should There be a Relationship? She raised the question of whether gay and lesbian Jewish organizations should be involved with national politics and, if so, to what extent. Some even wonder if there is a place for a "religious-based" organization within the politically-oriented gay movement, while others see the WCGLJO's very existence as a political statement.

Cohen is by profession the deputy director of the Human Rights Campaign Fund, which she described as the largest political organization lobbying for gay rights in the United States.

She admitted that within WCGLJO itself there is debate over whether the group is too Jewish or too gay in its direction. This reflects the problem many of its members have "reconciling their lives as gays and Jews."

Politics, religion already mixed

The reaction from her audience was largely in favor of taking the WCGLJO in a political direction, if given clear goals by the leadership. As gays and Jews, they have a role to play in the fight against discrimination, one New Yorker said. A lot of the opposition to equality for homosexuals comes from religious groups anyway, it was added, so politics and religion are already mixed.

Others felt they had become estranged from the Jewish community and traditional organized religion, and feel more at home within "gay culture." But one man from Montreal urged greater cooperation between the Jewish gay community and mainstream organizations.

Individual gays and lesbians should "do their part" within these organizations, he said. He intends to volunteer for the B'nai Brith League for Human Rights. "If I give to them, then, if a crisis should arise, we will be entitled to their help."

Others agreed on the need for greater contact with the general Jewish community, by first making it aware that there are Jewish homosexuals in its midst.

One man from San Francisco commented that AIDS has served as a wake-up call to the Jewish community there. After several prominent persons got the disease, the Jewish social agencies became active in helping the gay community. As a result, government then stepped up its efforts, he said.

Certainly, it was widely felt Jewish gays could learn much from the general Jewish community about organizing and raising money.

Others felt gay Jews can act as a "bridge' between the Jewish and general gay communities, broadening awareness of gay issues.

Cohen, who will be succeeded by Harvey Cohen of Montreal in September, said the message of the WCGLJO to the broader Jewish community has been: "Here we are, this is who we are. We've only been introducing ourselves. Maybe we need to be clearer about what we need from this other community."

The three-day conference ended with no resolutions or formal statements. That's largely because the WCGLJO is still at the stage of "educating" its affiliates about its function, Harvey Cohen said.

"The general feeling was that this conference set a new standard for the WCGLJO in terms of the quality of its organization and workshops."

Yakhdav is now bidding to host the 1999 international WCGLJO in Montreal, or possibly Ottawa, to attract gays from Toronto, Cohen said.

Israel's policy on Jerusalem under attack at symposium

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Participants at the recently-concluded United Nations North American symposium on the Question of Palestine heard several stinging rebukes of Israeli policy in Jerusalem — with a former Jerusalem city councillor and community activist leading the way.

Sarah Kaminer told a plenary meeting of the symposium that longstanding Israeli policy is geared to "Judaizing East Jerusalem. . . This is a right wing political plan made by people who want to take over [the] land."

The government of Israel and the city administration "are changing the face of Jerusalem so that in two years there will be very little left to talk about," she said.

Kaminer, who founded the Association for the Advancement of Neighborhood Self-Management, was speaking at the 11th annual NGO (non-governmental organizations) symposium. The symposium's goal was "to focus on mobilizing NGO support for cooperation and development."

The meeting was convened by "the committee on the exercise of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people," according to a background news release.

Participants at the symposium included representatives of the Canadian government, of Palestinian and North American NGOs, a former U.S. congressman, academics and Israeli human rights advocates.

Using a map of Jerusalem to illustrate her address, Kaminer said Israel is using legal tools that relate to land use planning to "turn it into a Jewish city with only isolated Arab neighborhoods."

She said Israel has expropriated land to build homes for 70,000 Israeli families while constructing only 555 units for the Arabs of Jerusalem.

Israel makes no secret of its intention to retain a demographic balance in the city of 78 per cent Jews versus 22 per cent Arabs, she continued.

Israel's oft-repeated claim that Jerusalem is its "eternal capital. . . is a line fed to the people of Jerusalem for 27 years. It has the power of a national symbol. . . and people have not investigated what this means" for the city's Arabs, she said.

Janice Abu Shakrah, director of the Palestine Human Rights Information Centre in Jerusalem, continued the attack on Israel's policy in the Holy City. She said the result of the plan to "Judaize" the city has been to place 21,000 Palestinian families in substandard conditions.

For Jerusalem to one day serve as the capital of a Palestinian state, the Palestinians must retain their institutions there and have a local population residing in good conditions, she said. More than 200 Palestinian homes have been demolished in the last few years with scarcely any attention paid, even in the Palestinian press, Abu Shakrah added.

In a telephone interview from Ottawa, Eli Yerushalmi, counselor at the Israeli embassy, declined to "discuss these issues because we know the sensitivity of Jerusalem and can blame each other over Jerusalem."

He said under the Declaration of Principles signed by Israel and the PLO, "Jerusalem is a non-issue for the next two years" and won't be discussed until "confidence has been built up."

But, he continued, "anyone who has seen Jerusalem knows these claims are nonsense." The Arab population of the city has grown in the last few years as Palestinians from the West Bank move to the Holy City, he said.

Back at the symposium, Naseer Aruri, a professor of political science at the University of Massachusetts, described the Palestinian efforts to craft a constitution for the self-rule period.

The initial draft in December 1993 was seriously flawed, he said. It was inconsistent with the principles of pluralism and decentralization of authority and it gave power to the president (Arafat) to control the legislature while also guaranteeing the PLO jobs in the new government.

An amended draft in January 1994 still gave broad powers to the PLO executive but it also emphasized rights and liberties, the professor stated.

However, the human rights section was "troubling" in that freedom of the press and religion were subject to the rights of others and to national security considerations. These provisions leave too much room for repression, Aruri suggested.

In addition, the charter contains no definition of citizenship or description of the qualifications to vote for office. Heightening his concern was a recent interview granted by Arafat to an Israeli newspaper in which the PLO leader suggested dissent would not be tolerated under the self-governing authority.

Aruri said the Palestinian public had little opportunity to participate in the drafting of the charter.

Marc Perron, assistant deputy minister of External Affairs Canada, called on NGOs to shift their focus from politics to economic development. NGOs can help mobilize financial and human resources for humanitarian causes among the Palestinians, he said.

B'Tselem joins UN conference

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Aaron Back's presence in Toronto early this month is a testament to the changes which have taken place in the Middle East in the past year.

Back, 38, is development director of B'Tselem, the controversial Israeli organization which monitors human rights in the territories beyond Israel's Green Line.

He was one of only two Jewish speakers from Israel at the three-day United Nations North American NGO Symposium on the Question of Palestine, which took place at the Delta Chelsea Inn. (The other was Sarah Kaminer, a former Jerusalem City Council member.)

Back believes he was invited in an attempt to "reach out to more mainstream Israeli organizations."

Yet "only in this context would we be considered mainstream," he noted during an interview between sessions.

Back participated in a plenary on The Declaration of Principles: Taking Stock of the Situation, and was a resource person for a workshop on Defending Human Rights.

B'Tselem's detractors charge that the organization is being used by the Palestinians to make Israel look bad.

Last summer, for example, B'Tselem released a well-publicized report about the killing of Palestinian children by Israeli security forces.

The organization also ran a public awareness campaign in Israel — its first — based on their findings.

"We weren't charging that the army was purposefully killing children," says Back. "It was the lack of stringent adherence to army policy which resulted in children being killed. It's a highly emotional issue, and it required people to listen carefully. Even supporters of B'Tselem were wondering how we could say such a thing, or whether we had the facts to prove it."

Aaron Back

After the report was issued, casualties among Palestinian children decreased dramatically, Back said.

Torture of Palestinian prisoners held by Israeli forces is another controversial issue brought to light by B'Tselem.

"We believe ourselves to be patriotic Israelis," said Back, a native of Buffalo, N.Y., who moved to Israel in 1987. "We believe that Israel [has] strong democratic values, [but] there are policies which cannot and should not be supported."

He concedes that B'Tselem's reports "may be more troubling" to Israeli Jews simply because of the source.

"It's somebody within your own community being critical," he said, suggesting that Palestinian reports might be easier to dismiss.

B'Tselem has been accused of accepting Arab money, a charge which Back denies. "We have never been offered any 'Arab money,' [although] for the record, I think it's a form of racism to say that a human rights organization shouldn't take Arab money. We as Jews would be aghast if someone painted our organization as corrupt [for accepting] Jewish money."

In fact, the organization's $500,000 budget is derived from a varied list of international donors, among them the New Israel Fund, the joint North American/Israeli venture which funds Israeli non-profit organizations addressing social and economic issues.

Although B'Tselem has faced considerable backlash since its inception in 1989, Back believes that the organization has made a positive contribution.

B'Tselem routinely submits its reports to the Israeli government for comment, after which it releases the written comments, Back said. "We believe the public has a right to hear both sides — the watchdog and the authorities."

"There's no doubt that both [Israelis and Palestinians] have tremendous psychological work to do within their societies," said Back, who has a doctorate in psychology. "Both have undergone great trauma."

Although Back condemns the use of violence, he is disinclined to condemn the rationalization of such violence. "By trying to understand how these [rationalization] processes are used, [you get] a better understanding of how to counter them," he explained.

Back is hopeful about eventual peace. Although he still hears some "overstated and divisive" language, he notes with pleasure a new "spirit of openness and understanding."

Caribbean Jewish Congress planned to unite isolated areas

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A former Montrealer who moved to Barbados in 1985 is part of an initiative to form the first "congress" for Jews living in the Caribbean.

During a recent visit to Montreal, lawyer Michael Davis discussed the idea with Alan Rose, the departing executive vice-president for Canadian Jewish Congress.

The main raison d'etre for the Caribbean Jewish Congress, as the body would be called, Davis said in an interview, would be to bind together the several thousand Jews — many of them living in tiny, isolated, and declining communities — scattered over the Caribbean area.

Right now, said Davis, a member of the Barbados Jewish community's executive committee, he and others spearheading the project are determining what level of interest exists among these various communities to create the congress.

But the proposed congress, he said, has already won the support of Elan Steinberg of the World Jewish Congress (WJC) and several of the Caribbean Jewish communities, such as in Aruba, Puerto Rico, and St. Thomas.

"There is an importance," said Davis, "in bringing these communities together, of searching out our Jewish brethren.

"We're all tiny, isolated Jewish communities in a sea of non-Jews, with a very low profile.

"We want to maintain our Jewish identity for the sake of our children and to maintain a feeling for Israel and for Yiddishkeit, so they will raise their children as Jews."

Davis, however, conceded that the process could take time, since the communities cover such a wide area and several of them consist only of handfuls of Jews. In some places, such as Trinidad and Tobago and St. Lucia, there are only one or two Jews, Davis said.

As well, while some communities, such as Barbados, with a Jewish population of 1,000 Jews, have shown support, others, such as the Bahamas, with perhaps 100 Jews, have not, and still others, like Jamaica, with several hundred Jews, have not yet responded to the overtures.

Davis estimated that in all, there are as many as 4,000 Jews who could belong to the congress. Besides those countries already listed, potential members could include nations like Granada, Antigua, Montserrat, Cuba, Curacao, Guadaloupe, Martinique and St. Martin.

The effort to create the congress is being led by founder Winston Ben Zebedee and Marshall Oran, president of the Barbados Jewish community.

Beyond its symbolic importance of creating a sense of "fellowship" among Caribbean Jews, the congress, Davis said, would also foster religious, social, cultural and business linkages and seek to strengthen mutual cooperation, to assist Jewish visitors to the Caribbean, to support Jewish education of children, and to address concerns unique to individual communities.

At a political level, Davis said, it would also act as a central representative voice, maintain contacts with Jewish communities around the world, promote aliyah, affirm support for Israel and promote exchanges with the Jewish state, combat prejudice, and work in association with Jewish organizations the world over, such as the WJC and Latin American Jewish communities.

In Davis' mind, Barbados exemplifies a Jewish community that has managed to thrive in the area. Founded in 1628, the Barbados Jewish community has two synagogues, a Jewish cemetery, and a cheder established through the assistance of Project Avrim, an initiative of the World Union of Jewish Students (WUJS) that helps isolated Jewish communities the world over.

The Barbados community is also now seeking a small number of children's books to establish a children's library.

Although some of the potential members to the Caribbean Jewish Congress are also members of the Commonwealth Jewish Council, a London-based organization linking Jewish communities in the Commonwealth, Davis stressed that their terms of reference are quite distinct and that there will be little if any duplication of activities.

Israeli embassy goes on-line with information on Holy Land

Massive database compiled

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

OTTAWA — If an airline ticket to Israel threatens to flatten your wallet, consider "visiting" the Jewish state the new-fangled, cheaper way: via the information superhighway.

As of this summer, Israel's embassy here becomes the first Israeli mission in the world to provide a computer link-up for those interested in the Holy Land.

Anyone with a computer and a modem can log onto an electronic bulletin board called SHALOMail ON ISRAEL to receive the latest news and views on Israel.

A year in the planning, the service is part of the National Capital FreeNet, a free Ottawa-area computer bulletin board that is part of Internet, the global information network.

The embassy's service is available 24-hours-a-day, year-round by dialing (613) 564-0808 or (613) 564-3600, and entering "go Israel" (preceded by the command "guest" if the user is not registered on Internet).

Once accessed, SHALOMail offers daily updates on current events, headlines and editorials from Israeli newspapers, news on economics, culture and domestic issues, says embassy spokesman Aviad Ivri, who designed the service with local embassy employee Norma Hochberg.

It also provides times and frequencies for the North American broadcasts of Israel Radio's shortwave service.

Users can also access data on various Israel-related issues, ranging from tourism and media to political matters and the peace process, as well as the electronic addresses of Israeli universities and other institutions.

What makes the service interactive is a special electronic mail (e-mail) highlight, in which the user poses a query about Israel, and someone at the embassy responds.

The user can also tap into a massive database compiled by Israel's foreign ministry, which stores virtually everything anyone would want to know about Israel, Ivri adds.

Already, the service is logging an average 300 calls a week.

Israel's embassy says the only other foreign legations in Canada to offer a similar service are those of France, Italy and Spain.

ETHIOPIAN OLIM GRADUATE

Ethiopian olim performed a traditional dance to celebrate their recent graduation from an intensive 10-month Mechina (pre-academic course) at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev in Beersheva. The 25 Mechina students will continue their studies in regular BGU courses, such as engineering, physiotherapy, nursing and social work. Because Beersheva is home to the largest Ethiopian Jewish community in Israel, the university has made a special effort to overcome social and cultural gaps by providing social services and preparatory courses. Programs include a course called Kidma (progress) for those with little formal education; a leadership training course; a "Newstart" program for adults leading to high school matriculation; and a community outreach program. For the past year, the Canadian Associates of BGU has focused on providing scholarships, living stipends and funding, and has supported a group of Ethiopian immigrant students in the Department of Social Work.

Israelis, Palestinians hurt in riot

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — Israel Defence Force Chief of Staff Maj.-Gen. Ehud Barak has placed the blame squarely on the Palestinian police for the outbreak of last Sunday's violent riots by laborers seeking to enter Israel from the Gaza Strip.

At least two Palestinians were killed and some 75 were wounded in the riots, believed to be the worst outbreak of violence since Palestinian self-rule began in Gaza and Jericho in May.

Some 21 Israelis were also reported injured by shots fired by Palestinian police and by rocks thrown by the laborers.

Among the Israelis injured were 17 border police, three soldiers and a civilian employee of the Egged bus company. One of the border police was reported in serious condition.

In an interview with Israel Radio on Sunday, Barak said Palestinian police officers had failed to show up at the Erez checkpoint in the predawn hours of Sunday to oversee the first Palestinian workers before they were allowed entry into Israel.

The Palestinian police are responsible for ensuring that the day laborers who seek work in Israel possess valid work permits and are not carrying weapons.

By the time the police arrived and began the procedure, Barak said, it was already after dawn. Pressing forward at the Erez crossing, a group of laborers began throwing rocks at the Israeli officials at the other side of the checkpoint.

Barak insisted that Palestinian authorities investigate the behavior of their police, who, unable to handle the mob, fired on both the Palestinian workers and on Israeli security personnel on the other side of the crossing.

Israeli soldiers and border police opened fire at the legs of the rioters but most of the shots fired were said to have come from the weapons of Palestinian police.

The mob overran the checkpoint and rushed the Egged bus terminal near the Erez crossing.

The Palestinians set fire to some 20 Egged buses waiting in the parking lot to transport the laborers to Israel. They also torched the Egged gas station.

Rioters threw gasoline bombs at an IDF armored personnel carrier, which burst into flames. According to news reports, smoke could be seen from 10 miles away.

Barak said the crossing would remain closed and Gaza residents would not be permitted to work in Israel until arrangements had been made to insure that Gaza police screen the entry of workers in a satisfactory manner.

A week earlier, Palestinian workers frustrated by delays at the checkpoint had also rioted, prompting Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin to seal off Gaza for 24 hours.

Deputy Defence Minister Mordechai Gur said Israeli and Palestinian officials had held several meetings during the past week in an effort to speed up the inspection process.

But the Palestinians had failed to abide by the agreements reached, Gur said.

In the wake of the rioting, PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat reportedly complained to the UN Security Council over what he said was Israeli fire at "innocent Palestinians" who were merely seeking employment in Israel.

As word of the riot spread, violent demonstrations erupted in West Bank towns, including Hebron and Nablus. In Hebron, the Army imposed a curfew in the main square after engaging in clashes with stone-throwing Palestinians. Clashes were also reported in Ramallah.

MPs meet Palestinian leaders

ating the same activities that it condemns in other instances.

Just a week before the Dingwall visit, a group of Canadian MPs from Quebec — one Liberal and six members of the Bloc Quebecois — met with Palestinian leaders at Orient House, with no Israeli government protest.

Moreover, that meeting was set up jointly by the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) and the Israeli Foreign Ministry — with the approval of Deputy Foreign minister Yossi Beilin.

"The foreign ministry was fully involved in organizing that meeting at Orient House," said Rob Ritter, national executive director of the CIC.

"We had absolutely no problem with that meeting. The Canadian officials who planned Minister Dingwall's visit probably assumed that what was okay a week ago, should be okay today."

The Dingwall incident highlighted the need for a clear-cut Israeli stand on the issue. The proposed law seems intended to put an end to Israeli ambivalence on the subject.

The meetings at Orient House by Canadian officials have become almost routine. One Israeli daily newspaper noted that in the last year there have been no less than 39 diplomatic meetings with officials from 15 countries at Orient House.

The Palestinian headquarters in East Jerusalem opened in 1991 when the Likud government was in power.

It served as an information centre for the Palestinian members of the delegation to the Madrid peace talks and has gradually acquired a quasi diplomatic status, serving as the meeting grounds for visiting VIPs.

But since the signing of the Declaration of Principles, which postpones any discussions on the future of Jerusalem for at least two years, both Israelis and Palestinians have been trying to establish facts on the ground in what many see as "the battle for Jerusalem."

In light of this, the routine meetings at the Orient House have assumed more serious connotations in the eyes of Israeli leaders.

Survivors getting compensation

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

STOCKHOLM — Some 160,000 Holocaust survivors not previously compensated for suffering at the hands of the Nazis have applied for personal compensation since Germany was reunited in October 1990.

Of these, 56,000 claims have been paid out so far, amounting to 280 million marks, or about $165 million (U.S.).

The figures were released at the biennial meeting of the board of directors of the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, held here last month.

Most of those who have applied are former residents of the old Soviet Union and eastern European nations who never received compensation because they were unable to file applications by the 1965 deadline, as stipulated in the 1952 German Federal Indemnification Law.

Israel Miller, president of the Claims Conference, said about 60 per cent of the claimants are now residents of Israel and the rest live in the United States and other Western countries.

The additional compensation was negotiated between the Claims Conference and the government of unified Germany in 1992, under terms set by the unification agreement between the former East and West Germanys.

While West Germany had paid out billions of dollars in reparations since World War II, East Germany had never compensated victims of Nazism.

The agreement was designed to rectify that imbalance and to provide opportunity to former residents of Communist regimes to apply for compensation.

Nearly 100,000 claims were filed with the special Claims Conference Hardship Fund, which provides one-time grants of 5,000 Deutschmarks, about $3,000, to Nazi victims who were unable to meet the original filing deadline.

An additional 63,000 claims were filed since January 1993 with the "Article 2 Fund," a special pool designed to provide monthly payments to Holocaust survivors who spent at least six months in concentration camps, 18 months in ghettos, or 18 months in hiding, but who have received little or no compensation, and live in difficult economic circumstances.

Akiva Lewinsky, head of the Claims Conference delegation to the negotiations with the German government, told those attending the board meeting that the Article 2 Fund was set up to benefit Nazi victims who suffered most or who live in dire straits.

Saul Kagan, executive vice president of the Claims Conference, told the meeting that a property restitution law had also come into existence following German reunification.

Since Germany was reunified in October 1990, the conference has been actively involved in securing legislation to restore Jewish property in what was East Germany to its former owners or, for heirless Jewish property, to the Claims Conference as successor organization.

Golan withdrawal hinted at by Peres

Jewish Telegraphic Agency and Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Foreign Minister Shimon Peres issued his broadest hint ever last Thursday that Israel may yield the entire Golan Heights in return for peace and security.

"The government of Israel has recognized Syrian sovereignty over the Golan Heights, and [the concept] of peace based on the international borders subject to the security needs of Israel," Peres told a gathering of United Kibbutz Movement members.

Peres's remarks were later repeated in a Foreign Ministry communique.

He noted a 1967 cabinet decision calling for negotiations with Syria on the basis of withdrawal to the "international border," subject to full peace and Israeli security concerns.

"Already in the times of the governments of [Levy] Eshkol and Golda Meir, Israel announced that the Syrians were sovereigns of the Golan," he stated.

"Syria's sovereignty over the Golan has been repeatedly recognized by Israel," he added.

Peres said he was opposed to any extension of settlements in the Golan, but favored the development of settlements in the Jordan Valley area north of Jericho.

Observers here interpreted Peres' remarks as an indication of Israeli flexibility over the Golan prior to last weekend's visit to the region of U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher.

Golan settlers reacted angrily to the statements. As one spokesman put it, the foreign minister's remarks were "a betrayal of Zionism and the whole settlement effort."

Following the Six-Day War, a national unity government, led by then-prime minister Levy Eshkol but also including Herut's Menachem Begin, adopted the following secret resolution: "In return for a peace agreement and full peaceful relations, Israel is prepared to withdraw to the international border with Syria, amid demilitarization of the Golan Heights and assuring the flow of water to the Jordan River."

The United States was notified of the secret decision, sources said, but the resolution was canceled soon thereafter.

In 1981, the Knesset voted to apply Israeli law to the Golan Heights.

JULIA KOSCHITZKY HONORED

Julia Koschitzky of Toronto was honored at a reception in Jerusalem recently tendered by the United Israel Appeal of Canada. The reception took place during the annual conference of the Keren Hayesod (World United Appeal), attended by a Canada delegation. Steve Ain, UIA executive vice president, announced that a scholarship fund is being established in honor of Koschitzky, immediate part president of UIA, and now chairman of the Board of Trustees of Keren Hayesod. Koschitzky (centre) is seen holding a scroll presented to her. With her is (from left) Dr. Amnon Shinar, director general of the UIA of Canada Israel office, Phil Granovsky, UIA board chairman, Harvey Wolfe of Montreal, and Steve Ain.

Collenette lauds Israel's peace stance response to the Gulf War and were said to be defensive in nature.

"Historically, we do not deal in military sales or procurement to countries where there is some question as to the use of these weapons," Collenette said. "Israel is a case in point. It has been engaged in hostilities, especially since [the start of] the intifada.

"But we feel the peace process is the right step. We think Israel is negotiating in good faith, and that certainly will be taken into account."

Canadian guidelines require Ottawa to closely monitor, if not ban, the sale of weapons to countries which pose a threat to Canada; are involved in or under imminent threat of hostilities; are under United Nations sanctions; or have a record of serious human rights violations, "unless it can be demonstrated that there is no reasonable risk that the goods might be used against the civilian population."

That last proviso enabled General Motors of Canada to sell over 1,000 Light Armored Vehicles (LAVs), fitted with automatic weapons, to Saudi Arabia.

Saudi Arabia is by far Canada's biggest weapons customer. Ottawa last year sold the Saudis nearly $219 million worth of military hardware, including the LAVs, which Collenette called "defensive."

Ottawa is also considering granting export permits to two other Canadian companies.

The Saudis are interested in buying three fully-armed frigates at $500 million each from Saint John Shipbuilding Ltd. in New Brunswick. In 1992, government officials approved the potential sale in principle, although a deal is said to be a long way off.

The Israeli embassy in Ottawa has expressed concern at the frigate deal, since Saudi Arabia is technically still in a state of war with Israel.

And Oerlikon Aerospace of St. Jean, Que. is currently negotiating with a Gulf state — probably Kuwait — for the sale of several sophisticated armored vehicles.

Collenette said there is no controversy over either Saudi Arabia's or Kuwait's use of weapons, since neither country has been accused of territorial expansionism.

"There is no controversy about their foreign or domestic policies," the minister stated. "There is, or has been, about Israel. Certainly there is a question as to Israeli intent. But we believe that is changing [as a result] of the recent peace accords, and any review of our policy would have to take into account that Israel no longer, by its actions, could be accused by anyone of territorial expansion. They are trying to resolve outstanding territorial disputes from the [1967] Six-Day War.

David Collenette

"As far as I'm concerned, Israel is not a belligerent state," Collenette said. "It is moving to deal with accusations that it is. Therefore, [Canada] should encourage the peace process, so no one can argue definitely that Israel is a belligerent state."

Collenette said the motive for Rabin's request likely combined a matter of principle with an interest in Canadian goods and know-how.

And for Canadians, "Israel is a very attractive country" for investment in high-tech research and development.

"There's no question a lot of Canadian companies want joint ventures [with Israel], including in defence-related areas," the minister said. "I personally think there could be a lot of good relationships in defence-related areas because of the brain-power in both countries."

A review of Canada's arms sales policy is due on Oct. 31. It will then go to the cabinet, and a decision is expected early next year, Collenette said.

Rabin also asked Canada to become involved in a peacekeeping contingent on the Golan Heights should a pact with Syria be signed.

Collenette said such a decison is up to Canada's cabinet.

Collenette added that he will represent Canada at commemorations marking the 50th anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising, to take place August 1 in Warsaw.

He noted that he's asked to be taken on a private tour of Auschwitz.

Israel takes action to fight those dreadful rays

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — In an effort to stem the alarming rate of skin cancer among Israelis, the Knesset is considering a bill that would reduce the price of sunscreens and require all outdoor pools and beaches to provide shady spots for people wishing to avoid the sun.

Knesset members this month unanimously voted in favor of the bill, which was introduced by Labor MK Rafi Alloul.

Believed to be the first of its kind anywhere in the world, the bill must pass two more readings before becoming law.

The legislation would also require schools to include lessons on health dangers posed by the sun.

Revenue for the bill would come from a 0.5 percent tax on tobacco products.

Alloul's spokesman, Danny Menkin, said the legislator had introduced the bill "after learning how many Israelis, particularly fair-skinned new immigrants from the former Soviet Union and elsewhere, were developing skin cancer due to a lack of education and the high price of sun-blocking products."

Depending on the brand and level of protection, a tube of sunscreen can range from $12 to $20 (U.S.).

According to the Israel Cancer Society, the rate of skin cancer here has increased dramatically. During the past decade, the incidence of melanoma has tripled in men and quadrupled in women.

B'nai Brith Women Convene

PICTON, Ont. — B'nai Brith Women of Canada (BBW/C) are describing their recent national conference held here as "a resounding success."

Over 100 women gathered from across Canada to network and discuss futhering goals of the organization.

The weekend meeting included information sessions on intermarriage, understanding different personality types and meeting members' needs through effective chapter programming.

At the plenary session, resolutions supported stricter gun control and easier access to breast cancer screening services. Policies were adopted on racism and immigration.

The BBW/C Volunteer of the Year Award was presented to Vicki Rumack of Aquarius Chapter in Toronto, while the Molly Friedman Award for Leadership, named for a former national BBW/C vice-president, went to Ruth Gilbert of Elan Chapter in Toronto.

Advocate for Whites Lodges Complaint

VANCOUVER — Tony McAleer, who operates the Canadian Liberty Net telephone line, has lodged a complaint with the British Columbia Council of Human Rights, alleging that whites — especially white males — are "brutally" discriminated against by employment equity programs.

Canadian Liberty Net has been found guilty in the past by federal human rights tribunals of spreading hatred against minorities and homosexuals.

McAleer was quoted last week in the Vancouver Sun as stating he's been singled out for hostile treatment by a human rights review committee "because I represented a white-rights group."

Skinhead Attacks Yeshiva Student

LOS ANGELES — The Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department is continuing its investigation of an attack this month by a self-proclaimed skinhead on a yeshiva student.

The victim, Zev Katz, a 19-year-old student working as a counselor at a Chabad summer camp for Russian immigrant children here, suffered minor bruises after being attacked with a three-foot pipe and a screw driver.

Katz said he was sitting in a parked car on the evening of July 5 when "this guy came out of nowhere, yelling 'I hate Jews! I'll kill you!' "

Katz said he was hit in the stomach once, before he grabbed the pipe and his friend grabbed the screwdriver.

Katz and others chased the fleeing attacker for about 50 metres, tackled him in an alley, and then sat on him until the police arrived.

The suspect was identified as Shane Dale McCain, an 18-year old transient, who said he was a skinhead. McCain was booked on suspicion of committing a hate crime and assault with a deadly weapon, and is being held in lieu of $150,000 bail.

Chicago Synagogue Firebombed

CHICAGO — In the latest of several recent incidents of vandalism at Jewish facilities on Chicago's North Side, a synagogue founded by Holocaust refugees from Tiktin, Poland, was hit earlier this month by a makeshift bomb.

According to detectives, a Molotov cocktail-type device was lobbed through a basement window of Mikro Kodesh Anshei Tiktin Synagogue.

The bomb charred the window sill and side of the building and started a small fire, which caused minimal damage before burning itself out.

In January, four synagogues and the Chicago Community Kollel for Advanced Torah Studies, all located in a several-block radius in the predominantly Jewish neighborhood of West Rogers Park, were the targets of arson attacks.

Three Palestinian-Americans were arrested in those cases.

There have been no arrests in the Mikro Kodesh case.

Clinton Visits Berlin Shul

BERLIN — Leaders of the German Jewish community laid out the red carpet for U.S. President Bill Clinton this month when he visited a Berlin synagogue that survived German arsonists in 1938 and Allied bombs during World War II.

Accompanied by German Chancellor Helmut Kohl during his visit to Berlin's New Synagogue last Tuesday, Clinton, in Europe for the G-7 summit, appeared moved as he toured the red brick building whose golden dome towers over the Jewish Quarter in the former East Berlin.

"It's a miracle it survived," Clinton said as he toured the synagogue.

Renovations on the ruined synagogue structure began in 1989 when the then East German government was intent on improving its relations with Israel. They are expected to be completed next year.

Plundered Judaica Recovered

BUDAPEST — Hungarian police have recovered most of a collection of Jewish artifacts stolen from the Jewish museum here last December.

Nearly 90 per cent of the collection, valued at $200 million, was recovered three weeks ago near Bucharest, according to Romania's police chief, Gen. Ion Pitulescu.

Pitulescu said the Mossad, Israel's secret service, helped Hungarian and Romanian police track down the collection.

Two suspects in the case, both Romanian citizens, have been arrested in Vienna and Frankfurt and Hungarian authorities are seeking their extradition.

The collection, stolen last Dec. 12, consisted of more than 180 pieces collected since 1916, including gold and silver religious objects, paintings and carpets.

Pitulescu said the collection would be returned to the museum within a month.

Russian Neo-Nazis Stopped

MOSCOW — Security forces here recently arrested members of a gang of Russian neo-Nazis who aimed to burn down Moscow cinemas screening the Holocaust epic Schindler's List.

The gang, which calls itself Werewolf, also planned a terror campaign against "those belonging to other ideologies — democrats, Communists and Jews," according to a document seized by Russian authorities.

Security agents confiscated a large number of arms from the commercial firm where the gang secretly operated. The gang's leader reportedly had an office decorated with portraits of Adolf Hitler, Nazi emblems and swastikas.

Swiss Jews Said Anxious

ZURICH — Two 11-year-old boys have confessed to the desecration last month of more than 100 gravestones at Switzerland's oldest Jewish cemetery here, police announced last week.

Last month, 144 tombstones were overturned at the cemetery. In February, 60 headstones were overturned and there was another act of vandalism in March.

Repairs to the cemetery, which was opened in 1862, will cost some $30,000.

Meanwhile, other desecrations and assaults on Jewish students have taken place in Switzerland.

The latest vandalism of a Jewish cemetery took place in the Swiss town of Argau, near Basel, this month. Eleven tombstones were desecrated.

Following a number of attacks on Jewish students, the head of the Zurich schools system, Hans Wehrli, sent a letter to parents and teachers.

The letter, released to news media this week, said that about a dozen Jewish teenagers had been jeered and assaulted in Zurich during the past two months.

Appearing on Swiss television last Friday, Werner Rom, the president of Zurich's Jewish community, said the country's Jews have been feeling "great anxiety" in the face of mounting xenophobia in Switzerland.

Plaques Vandalized Again

PARIS — For the second time this year, vandals have desecrated plaques commemorating the seven Jews who were executed on the orders of convicted war criminal Paul Touvier.

Vandals set a fire this month that charred the memorial on the wall of the Rillieux-la-Pape cemetery, near Lyons, where the seven hostages were executed on June 29, 1944.

The vandals painted the memorial plaques with swastikas, Stars of David and such messages as "We won't be the Palestinians of Europe" and "Jews Beware."

In April, Touvier, 79, a one-time Vichy official, was sentenced to life imprisonment for ordering the executions of the hostages in reprisal for the murder by the French Resistance of the Vichy propaganda minister, Philippe Henriot.

Front Line

Rabin's policy mix: determination and hesitation

By YESHAYAHU ANUG

It was said in the '60s that former prime minister Levi Eshkol was so indecisive that when offered either tea or coffee, he asked for half and half.

It is unlikely that Yitzhak Rabin's style of leadership will one day produce such lighthearted comments. Once the tone of criticism was benevolent with a touch of healthy humor. And then, although Rabin's tactics are zigzagging and badly explained, his strategy seems coherent.

True, more is at stake now. And, unlike in the '60s and '70s, the internal front is unpredictable. When Menachem Begin decided to return the Sinai peninsula to Egypt and to dismantle the Jewish settlements, he could not only count on the loyalty of the majority in his own Likud party, but also on the essential support of Labor, then in opposition. Sure, he too was then called a traitor by the hotheads of those days — not unlike Rabin today — but then civility in politics was still the rule and fanaticism was a more marginal phenomenon.

Since then the political debate has deteriorated to a degree that threatens not only the basic relationship between government and parliamentary opposition, but also the very fabric of Israel's democratic institutions under daily attack by the extreme right. During the last weeks the writing on the wall was very clear.

It is debatable whether public order was really on the brink of collapse when a major anti-government demonstration in Jerusalem, supported by all the rightist parties and patronized by Likud Mayor Ehud Olmert, went out of control. At the end of the event, hundreds of wild hotheads marched on the Old City with the clear intention to clash with Arabs and with security forces and to bring about the fall of the government or at least about an end to the peace process.

Though it is doubtful whether the country was in fact threatened by an attempted extreme-rightist putsch, as some observers were a bit too quick to conclude, a bloody confrontation in the heart of Jerusalem was avoided by the controlled reaction of the large police contingent. The security forces were perfectly capable of using more violence against the fanatics, but did not. Some Arab property was damaged at Damascus Gate. Another group of Jewish vandals attacked the U.S. Consulate General. Arabs and Americans will be compensated.

Yeshayahu Anug

The aftershocks in the Likud leadership were strong and the moderate elements found out how risky it was to associate with the extremists. It could have been foreseen that the tune at Zion's Square would have been called by fanatical settlers and by the inflammable Jerusalem riff-raff which can easily run wild.

At a meeting of the Likud caucus following the event, former foreign minister David Levi articulated the feelings of many of his colleagues when he said "if what was to happen in East Jerusalem had succeeded, a pogrom similar to that in the Hebron could have taken place and this time with Likud's complicity. We should avoid a situation which shows that we are unfit to govern." He was undoubtedly refering to the incendiary tone of the leaflets distributed by the Likud organizers of the rally and to the extremist speeches made by some Likud leaders at the event itself.

One can conclude that the soft handling by the government of dangerous troublemakers and the hard-core settlers has this time paid some dividends. But then it may have only postponed more dangerous confrontations, which the progressing peace process is bound to generate amongst its most determined opponents.

The rally in Jerusalem was called on the false pretext that Yasser Arafat was coming to pray at the mosques in East Jerusalem. It is now hoped that Olmert has learnt the hard way how rash it is to manipulate the internal peace of Jerusalem, a precious inheritance from his predecessor Teddy Kollek.

Another issue is the future of the settlements in the territories. Up to now, not even those situated in dense Arab environments like Hebron, scene of the Goldstein massacre and of recurring Hamas terror, have been touched by the government. Recent attempts by a group of settlers of Kiryat Arba (Hebron) to enlarge their community after the murder of a young girl by Hamas terrorists are probably to end again with some "mutually acceptable solution."

If so, a well-rehearsed cycle will be repeated. It starts with Hamas terror against settlers, who take action against a government they accuse of "impotence," and generally ends in some appeasement of the Jewish extremists and in restrictive measures against the Arab population of the area. The real winner of such rounds is Hamas, whose popularity in the frustrated Arab community is growing at the expense of the PLO, now engaged in unpopular peacemaking with the Jewish enemy.

Behind the headlines, which magnify every incident, and in spite of the feverish activity of its opponents on both sides, the peace process continues and gradually produces results. The PLO is not doing so badly in the areas under its control and these are relatively quiet, freed of the continuous friction with the Israeli army which has now withdrawn.

Meanwhile a growing number of settlers' families who had chosen to live in the territories merely to improve their standard of living and not for ideological reasons are seeking an equitable solution for their problem. They know ultimately many settlements will remain under Palestinian rule, and they don't want to experience its blessings. Nor do they want Jewish fanatics to speak for them now. They want to hear what the government has to offer in terms of resettlement and compensation.

Yet the government hesitates to confront the delicate issue. Political inhibitions or a misguided wait-and-see policy seem to account for inexcusable inaction, which is unfair to the settler's community as a whole. The dialogue with this worried population should have been started long ago.

The announcement of the imminent open meeting between King Hussein of Jordan and Prime Minister Rabin in Washington took some observers by surprise. The development proves that the peace process progresses more consistently and is much more wide-ranging than is visible on the surface. And it explains, at least in part, the apparent incoherence between Rabin's strategic determination and his tactical zigzags and suspected neglects on the home front. Perhaps because he is in a hurry to achieve his goal, he moves so slowly and so cautiously.

Islamic fundamentalism unique phenomenon

By GABRIEL BEN-DOR
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

Islamic fundamentalism has rapidly revealed the naivete, even irresponsibility, of the hope that the post-Cold War era will mark the "end of ideology."

It has shown itself a potent movement, replacing, in the minds of many intellectuals and policymakers, communism as the greatest ideological threat facing Western democracies in the foreseeable future.

Yet apologists hasten to add that Islamic fundamentalism is just one further form of "religious extremism." Hence, the implication seems to be, there's nothing particularly different about it. They are wrong. While it resembles other forms of extremism, it differs enough from them to be considered unique, perhaps a phenomenon in its own right. There are several reasons for this.

Islam is not a religion in the Western sense of the term, but a total civilization, making demands on the faithful in every sphere of life. Hence, Islam has never known a separation of "church" and state. On the contrary, everything that is Islamic quickly becomes politically relevant and politically dominant.

Islam has become the protest movement of the entire Third World against the values and traditions of the West. It is the rallying cry against its present materialistic values, as well as against its alleged past colonialist sins.

Islam is a young and militant faith. A Muslim friend of mind has argued that Judaism is the religion of the old and exhausted and Christianity the religion of the middle-aged, whose bellies are full. Only Islam, he says, is the creed of the young, the militant, the devoted, of those "on the march."

Islam is a religion of the community, not of individuals, or even small groups. Its ideals can be realized only in full Islamic communities, which means that it has adopted, over the ages, a distinctly collectivist flavor.

Since the ideals of an Islamic community have to be realized in concrete, large political frameworks, Islam, unlike other religions, has an explicitly territorial dimension, dividing the world into the Islamic realm and the sphere of the infidels. Under certain conditions, the latter becomes fair game for conquest and forcible conversion.

Islam has had a long legacy of jihad. True, on the theoretical and theological levels, jihad is a complex and even sophisticated concept (as we saw in the argument following Yasser Arafat's Johannesburg speech). However, in terms of popular (and hence politically potent) tradition, jihad is the classic holy war to liberate Islamic territory from its illegal occupiers.

In Islam, the idea of afterlife (i.e. the reward of going to heaven in return for dying for the faith) is taken with immediate seriousness, all but lacking in other modern religions. This seriousness produces a willingness for martyrdom, and hence the taking of extreme political and personal risks which are unprecedented in our era.

These points add up to an ideology which is different in its basic principles from any other, and hence to one which has a unique form of extremism.

Muslim scholars dislike the term fundamentalism, preferring substitutes such as "Islamism" for a phenomenon that is also known as extremism, radicalism, scripturalism or literalism.

Whatever the terminology, the resulting ideology is the toughest challenge faced by Muslim rulers in all 40 relevant countries, whose regimes are in as much danger from this fanatical potential as non-Muslim opponents and rivals.

Islamic fundamentalism may aim at the ultimate transformation of the world. But its immediate targets are the domestic regimes it needs to subvert in order to harness the state to its purposes, along with the smaller powers that share a common territory with Muslims, such as Israel.

Politically speaking, this means good news and bad news. The bad news is that Israel is facing an enemy even more dangerous and determined than the older-style radical secular nationalism.

The good news is that there is ample, albeit tacit or even surreptitious, room for cooperation with other mainstream forces in the Middle East. Many moves by previously implacable enemies such as Syria's Hafez al-Assad can be explained not only by the disintegration of the Soviet Union, but also by the mortal fear of Islamic fundamentalism.

We need to recognize this phenomenon for what it is, an authentic, deeply-rooted, popular Islamic movement. Competition between the PLO and Hamas has to do at least as much with the clash between secular nationalism and Islamic fundamentalism as with the strategy of Palestinian statehood vis-a-vis Israel.

At the same time, it is important to realize that the enemy isn't Islam or Muslims, but the fanatical manifestation of Islamic extremism that threatens modernity, democracy and peace for all peoples of the Middle East and beyond.

Prospective partners in the peace process need to be aware of the danger lurking from the common enemy.

The writer is professor of political science at the University of Haifa and academic director for the graduate studies program at the IDF's National Security College.

Closing a circle in Metulla

By NECHEMIA MEYERS

An infant's high-pitched cry in the synagogue of Metulla, a village on the Lebanese border, closed a circle in June that began there almost a century earlier.

The infant was protesting his circumcision, just as had Calman Eliyahu Mushin, son of Nahman and Chana Mushin, way back in 1898. The Mushins, immigrants from Russia who were among the founders of Metulla, had long been fervent Zionists. But they and their neighbors found life in the isolated farming village extremely difficult: food was scarce, disease was rife and marauding Druze from nearby Syria were a constant threat. Moreover, many of the infants born there did not survive for more than a few weeks or months.

Calman Eliyahu was one of the lucky ones, but he was not to remain in the town beyond the age of seven. Having decided that conditions in Palestine were unbearable, the Mushins emigrated to Australia. They chose that country because, unlike the United States, it did not force potential immigrants to undergo a medical examination, which Nahman, with his poor eyesight, would not have passed.

Young Alick, as Calman Eliyahu was known in Melbourne, became a real Aussie, with little interest in faraway Palestine. And like many of his generation, he came to believe that salvation for the Jews, as for mankind in general, would come when socialism replaced capitalism all over the globe.

But that phase passed as well. With the establishment of the State of Israel, Alick began to take pride in his "Palestinian heritage," a pride shared, and later surpassed, by his two daughters. Indeed, they both decided to make their home in Israel.

Himself a Sabra, Alick was eventually to have six Sabra grandchildren, most of whom were born after he died. And one of them, a girl by the name of Dana, eventually followed in his footsteps. For she and her husband Moshe decided that they would make their home in Kiryat Shmoneh, just three miles south of Metulla.

It has not been easy for them because Kiryat Shmoneh, like Metulla, suffers intermittent rocket attacks from Lebanon. They have stuck it out, however, and have become respected members of the community, Dana as a teacher of disabled youngsters and Moshe as the director of the regional child development centre.

While the couple brought with them a boy born in the Tel Aviv area, they wanted more offspring and Dana eventually became pregnant. Then, when she learned through an ultrasound that she was carrying a second boy, her sense of history took over. Her grandfather, Dana knew, had been born in a Metulla farmstead and circumcised in the synagogue next door. So while her own child was to be born in a hospital, there was no reason, she felt, why he shouldn't be circumcised in the same place as his great-grandfather.

Last week he was, thus bringing a century-long circle to a fitting close.

I was naturally thrilled about the Metulla event because the little boy circumcised was not only a direct descendent of Calman Eliyahu Mushin, my wife's father, but also, of course, my grandchild. So I naturally told all my friends about the event.

While they congratulated me, one thing seemed to bother them. Why, they wondered, should my daughter, coming from a good middle-class home in central Israel, choose to live in a distant development town, where amenities are limited and security uncertain? That was a place to send new immigrants, people who have no alternative, but surely, they said, not one for a girl like her.

This reaction says something about contemporary Israelis, many of whom can more readily understand a young person who goes to live in London or Los Angeles than one who chooses the Negev or the Galilee.

Where have all the idealists gone?

Italy's neo-fascists

Should we be concerned by the presence of five neo-fascist ministers in the Italian cabinet?

Ordinarily, the answer would be a resounding yes. After all, the National Alliance — the neo-fascist party which is an integral component of Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi's coalition government — is the offspring of the Italian Social Movement, which itself was ideologically inspired by Benito Mussolini's fascist regime. Lest we forget, Mussolini's government, perhaps under German pressure, enacted anti-Semitic legislation which disenfranchised and humiliated the long-established Jewish community in Italy.

Nevertheless, Gianfranco Fini — the head of the National Alliance — cannot, in all honesty, be branded as a clone of the late, unlamented Mussolini. True, Fini is a dyed-in-the-wool conservative whose views on issues like immigration are repugnant. And, one might add, his characterization of Mussolini as "the greatest statesman of the century" was nothing if not foolish and short-sighted.

However, it seems clear that neither Fini nor his lieutenants are remotely interested in resurrecting the ruinous, racist, repressive policies espoused by Mussolini in the latter part of his career. Indeed, the National Alliance has striven to portray itself as the Italian equivalent of British conservatives or French Gaullists.

If anything, Fini has distanced the National Alliance from Mussolini's anti-Semitic legacy. He has condemned anti-Semitism and, in an interesting though calculating ceremony, Fini recently paid tribute to the memory of Leon Klinghoffer, the American Jewish hostage who was murdered by Palestinian terrorists aboard the Italian cruise ship Achille Lauro. Furthermore, Fini now recognizes, if somewhat belatedly, that Italy's entente with Nazi Germany was not only a historic "blunder," but a "disaster" for Italy.

Meanwhile, the Italian foreign minister, Antonio Martino, has expressed support for Germany's initiative to harmonize European Union laws against anti-Semitism and xenophobia. And he has stressed a desire for closer relations between Italy and Israel.

We should monitor the neo-fascists who sit in Berlusconi's cabinet. But we should not jump to hasty, unwarranted conclusions.

Equality in education

The Ontario Court of Appeal has ruled that the government of Ontario's refusal to fund the general studies portion of private, religious-based independent schools is not unconstitutional. The decision was unanimous.

Speaking on behalf of his four colleagues on the panel, Chief Justice Charles Dubin wrote that the "appellants' freedom of religion and their right to equal benefit of the law without discrimination on the basis of religion were not infringed by the absence of public funding."

The Court ruled that even if the appellants' freedom of religion and right to equal benefit of the law without discrimination were infringed by the absence of public funding, such absence is a reasonable limit on such freedoms and rights within Section 1 of the Charter.

And, as if to bar any further challenge through the legal door, the Court also held that "even if such breaches were not justified under Section 1 of the Charter, it would be inappropriate for the court to grant the remedy sought . . . Such changes are for the Legislature and not the courts to make."

But the Legislature has been an unwilling forum of this legislative change. For the past decade, the governments of Ontario have cravenly ignored the unequal treatment.

The decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal provides an exclamatory epilogue to the Task Force Report on Jewish Continuity released by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto less than three weeks earlier.

"At the 'core' of Jewish continuity is Jewish education." The Task Force states this in unequivocal terms. But the effect of the Court's decision is to ensure that tuition fees to Ontario's Jewish day schools will remain very high, further and further out of reach of the mainstream of families.

As a result, the demand will increase on the Federation to abate the financial burden of the onerous tuitions for those families. Yet the Federation's ability to do so will not have kept pace with the need to do so. And the temptation on Federation leaders will be great to direct more of the already scarce resources away from the day schools to a variety of other Jewish educational formats, which, while very important, have been shown by studies to be less effective in bonding children to their Judaism.

This temptation must be resisted.

At the same time, our leaders must proceed boldly in a number of arenas — policy planning, fiscal, legal, and political — to attempt to counter the effect of the Appeal Court's decision. If we are truly concerned about our community, we have no choice.

MISSING COUSIN HEROES

The American Veterans of Israel is in the process of erecting a memorial at Sha'ar Hagai, Israel, to commemorate and inscribe the names of volunteers from Canada and the United States who were killed during Israel's War of Independence. Eddy Kaplansky (formerly of Montreal) is chairing the research committee to achieve as complete and historically accurate a roster as humanly possible after all these years.

Two names still not confirmed are those of Harvey Cohen and Ed Lucatch. The story persists that these 19-year-old cousins from Toronto arrived at the Tel Litwinsky induction centre early in June, 1948, and within days were missing in action. Although a number of ex-Machalniks are familiar with that sad story, no one has yet claimed to have actually met or seen the cousins in Israel or on the way there. Searches of the Israel Defence Forces archives have yielded no records of them or their disappearance.

The American Veterans of Israel is composed of volunteers from Canada and the United States who manned the rescue ships of Aliya Bet (1946-47), and who served in the armed forces of Israel during its War of Independence (1948).

REAL JEWISH ROOTS

Re: "Hebrew classes a weekly bore for these kids" (CJN July 7).

I hope that by the time Barbara Silverstein reads this she'll realize that her "tribal and exclusionary" instincts motivated her to count herself in.

Ms. Silverstein's confessional is bang on: It is extremely difficult to get children to attend heritage classes when there is so little connection between what they are learning and what goes on at home. Fact is, she has thrust a dagger of truth through the heart of the Jewish continuity debate. One must make ends meet through intellect and action. One must not just learn "Jewish;" one must "live" Jewish as well. To count oneself in, one must count one's whole self in. To be a Jew means being a Jew at home and at school, in public and in private.

Ms. Silverstein also makes a powerful argument for day school education. After all, a hard day of schooling deserves a hard afternoon of playing. True, Hebrew heritage may not be as much fun as swimming or tennis, even if the short-term pain may be worth the long-term gain. Toronto boasts one of the most dynamic and effective day school systems in the world. Led by the community's Associated Hebrew School, an excellent general and Jewish studies education could be provided to the Silverstein kids, while still leaving time for valuable and healthy after-school activities.

Ms. Silverstein and her husband have the power to break the cycle of after-school arguments and excuses if only they could see the forest for the trees.

Perhaps the exercise of confession will help her give — and their children receive — the priceless gift of education, while strengthening the connection to Jewish roots to which they so passionately cleave. Even if they don't realize it.

QUERIES RABIN'S STANCE

An evil partnership: Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin manages to weave a link between Israelis who oppose his peace plan and Islamic Jihad and Hamas. With this point of view, I am certain he would be hired immediately by any of several Canadian newspapers to report and/or editorialize on Israel and the Middle East.

Rabin's ability to blur differences between victims (Israeli children) and assailants (Islamic Jihad and Hamas) so that the victim becomes the assailant is a leaf out of the handbook of many Middle East correspondents.

I await with apprehension Rabin's next response to Israeli citizens who exercise their democratic right to disagree with their Prime Minister.

CALLING ALL POLITSKYS

We are members of the Politsky family of Toronto searching for a branch of our family tree gone missing in Cleveland, Ohio.

Contact with descendants of David Shloma Politsky and his wife Heshka (formerly Greenberg) was lost about 35 years ago. This branch of the family lived in Cleveland. The couple had twin daughters and a son and changed their surname to Politska.

The Politsky clan hopes to find members of this lost branch and any other family members who may have slipped through the cracks. We are all descendants of Israel Leib Politsky, who emigrated from Russia around the turn of the century and died in 1916. Although he was officially 114 years old at the time of his death, he is actually believed to have been 117 years old.

Over time, the Politsky family changed its surname to Paulin. Major descendant branches include Weber. Kroll, Peikes, Grosbein and Belovin. Politsky has also been spelled Politzky.

Our motive for searching for our long-lost relatives is twofold: we would like to include them in our family tree and we want to invite them to a special commemorative family picnic in Toronto Sunday, August 28.

The picnic, scheduled to start at 10 a.m. at Earl Bales Park in North York, is being held to celebrate the 65th anniversary of a large family picnic in 1929 in Toronto.

We can be contacted in Toronto at (416) 633-1796 (Norman and Margo Grosbein) or (416) 635-1145 (Frances Strauss).

IN A GLASS TOWER

Joyce Eklove's (Canadian Jewish Congress Plenary Chair) April 14 response to Alan Simons' letter about the opening session of the CJC's plenary suggests she is living in a glass tower.

Like Alan Simons, I, and a dozen of my friends who attended the plenary were disgusted with the focus on lengthy opening speeches, at the expense of a meaningful panel discussion. Moreover, there was not "the odd heckle" as Eklove claims, but the raving of the many Kach-supporting fanatics.

Eklove, who thinks this is a healthy sign of democracy, should be reminded that even in the democracy of Israel, Kach is an illegal terrorist organization. Would she consider anti-Jewish heckling as an "indication of democracy in action?"

Israel must press Arafat on MiAs

By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

Yasser Arafat seems to have a difficult time living down his publicity. Some of this is understandable, inasmuch as he is caught between political realities on the one hand and vast expectation of his own people on the other.

His remark in South Africa, that the current accord with Israel is but a way station for liberating the whole land, is just one of the reasons that increasing numbers of Israelis are becoming dubious that the peace accord will succeed. If it were not for Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin it would collapse tomorrow. It is crucial for both him and Mr. Arafat to keep it going.

There is one matter in which Mr. Arafat could gain immediate points in Israel. All he has to do is to tell the world whether three Israeli MiAs — soldiers Missing in Action — are alive or not. To withhold this information is torture for the families involved and increases the belief of many that this man cannot be trusted. Consequently, 84 per cent of Israelis think that the release of more Palestinian prisoners should be halted until there is verifiable information regarding the MiAs.

Zechariah Baumel, Yehuda Katz, and Zvi Feldman were captured in Lebanon in June 1982, and so far no urging of the International Coalition For Missing Israeli Soldiers has availed anything.

Rabbi Plaut

If ever there was an opportunity for Mr. Arafat to do something about it, the time is now. He needs Israel more than he ever did. If the peace process is derailed now, his own dreams and those of many of his fellow Palestinians will be shattered for an indefinite time to come.

I was brought face to face with this ugly problem because I had a visit from Miriam Baumel, mother of one of the three. She and her husband Yona have for years spearheaded an attempt to urge the Israeli government to make the MiA question a top priority. Mrs. Baumel is a native of Brooklyn and she and her family made aliyah some years ago. She appeared to talk calmly about what needs to be done, but I could feel the deep emotion fuelling her words. For the last few months she and the other families have feared that the inquiry into the fate of the MiAs has reached a dead end. It has moved off the headlines of the Israeli press and television, and lack of public interest could be a death knell for the unfortunate prisoners.

She thinks, and I think rightly so, that this is a crucial moment when Mr. Rabin and his government have a real chance to extract the relevant information from Mr. Arafat. The latter holds that his information will not be forthcoming until all Palestinians are released from Israeli prisons, a demand which on the face of it is without a chance of being heeded.

Some years ago the Israeli Intelligence Department became the victim of a ploy by its Syrian counterpart. The latter had told Syria's Chief Rabbi Abraham Hamra that it had four Jewish soldiers' bodies ready for burial. However, the rabbi was not allowed to open the caskets.

Major General Yehoshua Saguy, then head of the IDF Military Intelligence, admitted later that he read the signals wrong. He believed that the four bodies the Syrians said were buried in a Damascus cemetery were those that had been originally missing.

Eventually the Red Cross was permitted to exhume the bodies and it turned out that only one was that of an Israeli, identified as Zohar Lifschitz. He had been in the same tank with Yehuda Katz, but there was no accounting for Katz or the other two.

Last year the PLO provided the Baumels with their son's name tag — solid proof that they were quite aware of his fate. There is also little question that President Hafez al-Assad of Syria knows the answer.

I believe that a man like Prime Minister Rabin, himself a former soldier, knows what MiAs mean to the families who spend their years hanging between hope and fear. He should ask Mr. Arafat squarely, "Tell us their status. Are they alive or are they dead? And give us proof, for without that we cannot talk to you. My people will lose the last ounce of trust in you."

I think that Mr. Arafat might come through with the answer.

Oslo accord opened new chapter in Middle East

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Almost a year has elapsed since the world was astonished to learn of the secret talks in Norway between Israel and the PLO. The so-called Oslo back-channel, created by an obscure Norwegian social scientist, was momentous and historic, paving the way for Palestinian self-determination and possibly a comprehensive settlement of the Arab-Israeli dispute.

In a sense, the Norwegian connection — which could well be a model for Syria to emulate — really began when the director of a Norwegian think-tank carrrying out a socio-economic survey of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip met a young Israeli parliamentarian in Tel Aviv on the eve of the Labor party's election victory in the summmer of 1992.

Terje Larsen was the Norwegian. Yossi Beilin was the Israeli. Both agreed that circumstances — notably the collapse of the Soviet Union and the defanging of Iraq in the 1991 Gulf War — favored a breakthrough in Israel's lagging bilateral peace talks with a Palestinian delegation in Washington.

More important, they concurred that a two-tiered system of negotiations — the existing public track and a new secret channel — might break the impasse.

Larsen suggested that Norway, which was respected by both sides, could set up secret contacts between Israel and the PLO, which, from behind the scenes, was directing the Washington negotiations with Israel. Beilin, a dove who would become the deputy foreign minister, was enthusiastic.

Several months later, writes Jane Corbin in Gaza First (Fitzhenry & Whiteside, $29.95), the first account of the Oslo connection, two Norwegian diplomats visited Israel and officially offered Norway's services as an intermediary. The officials were Jan Egeland, the deputy foreign minister, and Mona Juul, Larsen's wife and a middle-ranking diplomat who specialized in Middle Eastern affairs.

In December 1992, the scene shifted to London, where Arab-Israeli multilateral talks on economics, which were part of the overall Madrid peace process, were taking place.

Beilin was in London, as was his friend, a Haifa University professor named Yair Hirschfeld. Without informing Beilin, Hirschfeld met with an influential member of the PLO, Ahmed Qurei, otherwise known as Abu Ala. The meeting was arranged by Hanan Ashrawi, a prominent official with the Palestinian delegation.

It was still illegal for Israelis to meet with PLO officials, but Beilin did not forbid Hirschfeld to meet Abu Ala again. Beilin was rightly confident that a Labor bill legalizing contact with the PLO would become law within weeks.

Nevertheless, Beilin insisted that any meetings with the PLO conducted by Hirschfeld should not be seen as negotiations, but as wide-ranging discussions of the issues. The Norwegians envisaged Hirschfeld's discussions as an adjunct to the public Palestinian channel.

The discussions got underway in January 1993 in a locale near Oslo. Hirschfeld brought along his close friend and associate, Ron Pundak. The PLO team consisted of Abu Ala, Maher El Kurd and Hassan Asfour.

Corbin credits Abu Ala with suggesting that the peace process should start with an Israeli withdrawal from Gaza, an area the new Labor government wanted to jettison in exchange for security guarantees, and the promise of Israeli-Palestinian cooperation. Jericho would be added to the equation at PLO chieftain Yasser Arafat's suggestion. Abu Ala also declared that the negotiators should work toward a declaration of principles, a concept endorsed by Hirschfeld and Pundak.

According to Corbin, the Norwegians, principally Larsen, played an important role by convincing both parties that, despite the gap in their respective positions, the discussions would bear fruit. She adds that many of the brainstorming sessions, some of which Larsen attended, took place in the wintry woods.

When Beilin heard that a Gaza First plan was supported by the PLO, he informed his boss, Shimon Peres, of the secret channel. Peres was interested in Beilin's initiative because he, too, saw a withdrawal from Gaza as an opening gambit. Peres duly told Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin about the discussions, and although Rabin did not greet the news with great enthusiasm, he was not opposed. He believed that an agreement with Syria, not the Palestinians, would be the real key to peace in the region.

In February 1993, the two sides hammered out a preliminary version of a Declaration of Principles (DoP) — the first of what would be 25 drafts. At this point, Peres began taking the Oslo channel seriously, forming a special working group to monitor progress. One of its members was Avi Gill, Peres' policy advisor and former press attache at the Israeli embassy in Ottawa.

Shortly afterward, Peres and Rabin agreed to upgrade the level of Israel's representation in Norway. Uri Savir, the director-general of the Foreign Ministry and Peres' protege, was dispatched to Norway.

Savir, who was also once Israel's press attache in Ottawa, concluded that the secret channel had great potential. He advised Peres to engage in real negotiations with the PLO. Hirschfeld and Pundak withdrew, having fulfilled their function. They had opened a genuine dialogue with the Palestinians, breaking down psychological barriers.

Now it was time for Joel Singer, an experienced Israeli lawyer who had worked on the 1978 Camp David Accords, to enter the picture. Singer could take the draft DoP and turn it into a basis for direct negotiations.

In the early summer, the Agence France-Presse agency carried a report of a secret Israeli-PLO backchannel in Norway. But, as Corbin puts it, the story was "a one-day wonder."

A fierce Israeli military operation in southern Lebanon in late July did not affect the talks. Abu Ala hardly mentioned it, Corbin says.

Nevertheless, the negotiations ran into turbulence, with both sides resorting to brinkmanship. At one juncture, for example, Savir, in exasperation with his PLO interlocutors, blurted out, "We are stuck. We are going home now — and we may never come back."

The talks dragged on throughout the summer, but in mid-August, Peres and Rabin decided that a deal should be finalized. Peres called the Norwegian foreign minister, Johan Jorgen Holst (who died last January), and asked to meet him secretly in Stockholm.

At Peres' behest, Holst called Arafat in Tunis, and final negotiations were launched. After eight hours of intense debate, an agreement emerged. On Aug. 20, at 2 a.m., Peres met Abu Ala, and the DoP was signed.

Some weeks later, Israel and the PLO agreed on a pact of mutual recognition, an event of perhaps more importance than the DoP itself.

The building blocks of peace and cooperation had been set into place.

It remains to be seen where all this will lead.

Shaw, strawberries and the supernatural

By JACK CHISVIN

My wife and I can spend hours at a time together without saying a word. And yet we still know exactly what the other is thinking. We share a supernatural rapport. It is something you have to experience to truly understand. If you have, no explanation is necessary. If you haven't, no explanation is possible.

As an engineer, for me the supernatural should be contrary to reason. My training in engineering has taught me how to apply the laws of nature, and deal with them as a jigsaw puzzle consisting of a finite number of pieces, all neatly fitting together. Still there are occurrences that are beyond rational and daily experiences — forces, notions, events in our everyday life, often at remote points in the coordinates of infinity and eternity which cannot be explained. This is the supernatural.

Existentialist theologians may argue differently, but I suggest that the supernatural is a subjective notion. Concepts of the supernatural run a gamut of beliefs. The various ways we define it and respond to it are determined by so many social, cultural and intellectual attitudes — religion, science, mysticism, and education. There appears to be a communication not only between living things and their environment, but among all things living in that environment. An intricate web of interactions connects all life into one vast self-maintaining system. Each part is related to every other part and we are all part of the whole, directed by an unexplained supernatural power.

Jack Chisvin

For more than 20 consecutive years, accompanied by the same friends, we attend a matinee performance at the Shaw Festival Theatre on the third Wednesday of June. Over the years we have developed a routine. One of the activities I most look forward to on that day is a visit to a fruit farm to pick strawberries for our picnic lunch, this being the peak of the strawberry season in Niagara.

Strawberries are my passion. No dessert can compare with freshly picked, field-ripened strawberries: plump, sweet and succulent, with a slight tartness. The juiciness and succulence are enhanced if the strawberries are doused with brandy, or balsamic vinegar for the non-indulgent. It will be my dessert of choice when I go to heaven (because there ain't no other place to go).

This year the third Wednesday in June came early — think about it — and because of the conspiratorial nature of the weather the fruit ripened late. The farm that we usually patronize picked the first crop only that morning but it was already shipped to Toronto. So my expectations went unfilled and our picnic lunch was without strawberries for dessert.

On the day after attending Shaw, I was rushing from one meeting to another through the downtown Toronto underground maze when I passed a fruit stand displaying local strawberries. I made a mental note to buy some after my last meeting. It was almost 5 p.m. by the time I got back to the fruit stand and by then the strawberries were sold out. However, the clerk advised there might be some left at their main market in the north end of the city. I knew that my wife was out shopping and I thought if I could get a message to her perhaps she could stop by that market. As would happen her cellular phone was not energized — too bad.

When I reached home later that evening, just inside the door sat several containers of strawberries. "Where did these come from?" I enquired.

"I was in a shopping centre late this afternoon," my wife replied, "and had an urge to stop at the fruit market and there were those containers of strawberries asking to be bought." How did my wife get my message? Were the strawberries the medium, or was it our supernatural rapport?

I can't explain gravity, magnetism, electricity and other phemomena, although I know how to enlist these forces in my engineering work. I similarly cannot explain how I communicate with my wife, but I can discriminate between the probable and the improbable, and accept the contradiction between rationalism and the supernatural which produces such simple but exciting human adventures — and isn't that the common theme that occurs in George Bernard Shaw's plays?

An ambivalent relationship

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Scratch a Pole and you'll find an anti-Semite. More often than not, this is the skewed perception most Jews — particularly post-war immigrants from Poland, including my own parents — harbor of Poles.

As Jews realize, ethnic stereotying is a dangerous exercise in self-delusion. Yet no one can disguise the fact that Jewish-Polish relations, especially in this century, have been marred by hostility and suspicion.

Even myopic observers cannot ignore the periodic pogroms which broke out after Poland's independence in 1918, the state-sanctioned anti-Semitism of the 1930s, the general indifference toward Jewish suffering displayed by many Poles during the Holocaust, and the anti-Semitic convulsions of the Communist era.

On the other hand, medieval Polish kings welcomed Jewish refugees, and later granted Jewish communities a considerable degree of cultural and political autonomy. And during the Holocaust, numerous Poles risked their lives and that of their families to assist Jews.

So, if nothing else, Poles and Jews have an incredibly complex and tangled history, which is all too easy to simplify and distort.

Three recently-published books wrestle with this mercurial relationship. Each essentially addresses a different facet of the story.

•Polish-Jewish Relations During The Second World War (Northwestern University Press, $14.95, US) is written by the eminent historian Emmanuel Ringelblum, who perished at the hands of the Germans in 1944.

•Jews In Poland (Hippocrene Books $19.95, US), by Catholic scholar and concentration camp survivor Iwo Cyprian Pogonowski, traces Jewish settlement from the earliest times.

•Poles And Jews: A Failed Brotherhood (University Press of New England, $20, US), a collaborative effort by Magdalena Opalski of Carleton University and Israel Bartal of the Hebrew University, examines the topic under review against the backdrop of the Polish anti-czarist insurrection of 1861-62.

Born in 1900, Emmanuel Ringelblum was one of the outstanding historians of his generation. Specializing in Polish-Jewish questions, his erudition was recognized by YIVO, the Yiddish scientific institution based in Vilna. In 1929, he joined the staff of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee in Warsaw. After the establishment of the ghetto in 1940, he and others founded Oneg Shabbat, a clandestine organization whose purpose was to document the Nazi occupation.

Prior to the ghetto uprising, he and his family were hidden by a Polish worker. Ringelblum wrote Polish-Jewish Relations in 1942 and 1943. Highly-selected excerpts were published following the war, but only now is the unexpurgated text available.

Launching his narrative, Ringelblum expresses gratitude to those Poles who saved his life — not once, but twice. Having done this, he analyzes the gamut of Polish-Jewish relations. It is not a flattering picture. The Polish government's policies, he declares in no uncertain terms, "helped unleash such an anti-Semitic hue and cry that Poland before the war became the leading anti-Semitic country, second to Germany alone."

Some will vehemently disagree with this characterization. But consider the evidence marshalled by the meticulous Ringelblum.

In an effort to foster the development of an indigenous mercantile class, the government turned a blind eye to an economic boycott of Jewish businesses. Jewish artisans were not allowed to submit tenders for work to be done for state institutions and authorities. Jewish workers were dismissed from government and municipal establishments. In the armed forces, a Jew could not rise above the rank of a lieutenant (reserves), and Jews were not accepted in the professional army.

On another front, universities became breeding grounds of anti-Semitism, with strikers calling for the introduction of a numerus nullus for Jews.

In Ringelblum's view, only "class-conscious" Polish workers fought fascism in all its forms openly and unreservedly.

Ringelblum claims that the Jewish question disappeared from public discourse shortly before Germany invaded Poland. "Now it was understood that anti-Semitism in Poland was a weapon in Hitler's hands," he writes.

However, before Warsaw fell, "the hydra of anti-Semitism began raising its head again." Ringelblum cites a damning example: "It was a common occurrence for Jews not to be allowed into the air raid shelters in purely Polish blocks of flats, even during bombing."

He adds that conflicts also arose between Jews and Poles queuing for precious food supplies and water.

In the aftermath of Germany's invasion, he charges, there was "a revival of anti-Semitism in the fullest sense of the term" in Poland. A significant majority of Poles, he explains, condemned German excesses. But they did not try to dissociate themselves from "the anti-Semitic beasts that co-operated with the Germans..." And furthermore, the Polish underground displayed "passivity" in the face of the Nazi onslaught.

Ringelblum castigates Polish blackmailers and informers who collaborated with the Germans, as well as the Polish Blue Police, which played "a most lamentable role" in the extermination of Poland's Jews.

He condemns the Polish middle-class, which, he claims, rejoiced "at the Nazi solution to the Jewish problem." And he goes on to say that Poland's rural population was not always helpful in cases when Jews fleeing Nazi terror sought sanctuary.

What is more, the clergy reacted "almost with indifference," while the Home Army (an underground force) supplied arms to Jewish fighters "only in very small quantities."

By Ringelblum's estimate, 10,000 to 15,000 Warsaw Jews were hidden by two to three thousand Polish families. "If we take into account that these (Polish) families (were) acting with the knowledge and approval of their nearest relatives, we reach the conclusion that at least ten to 15,000 Polish families in Warsaw (were) helping to hide Jews."

Ringelblum reproduces a paragraph from a 1944 report written by the Polish government-in-exile's director of foreign affairs, who was based in London. It reads: "The prevailing mood (in Poland) is not to leave any openings for the Jews, in however small numbers, to return to their previous businesses and workshops. The non-Jewish population has taken the place of the Jews... and their return would be regarded not as restitution but as an invasion to be resisted by physical force."

These chilling but frank sentiments speak volumes.

Iwo Pogonowski, a Lwow-born scholar of Polish affairs living in the United States, reminds readers that Poland was "the only" country to accept "a massive influx" of Jewish refugees in the 14th and 15th centuries. This assertion is only partly true, since many Spanish Jews found refuge in the Ottoman Empire.

Poland, too, extended "unprecedented and long-lasting privileges" to Jewish settlers, and did not force them into ghettos, as elsewhere in Europe. No one can quarrel with these statements, nor with Pogonowski's thesis that the Jews of Poland were given "broad cultural and political autonomy."

Early modern Poland may have been, as he suggests, a "heaven for the Jews." But this idyll, he admits, was shattered in the Middle Ages by anti-Jewish riots in localities like Brzeziny, Gabin and Leczyca.

Pogonowski argues that the partitions of Poland in the 18th and 19th centuries altered the Poles' relationship of "symbiosis and interdependence" with the Jews into one marked by "competition."

While Poles struggled to preserve their sovereignty, he claims, most Jews were primarily concerned with maintaining their identity as Jews. "They did not feel that Polish independence was vital to them," he writes.

He further claims that Russia, Germany and Austria "deliberately encouraged and manipulated latent tensions between Poles and Jews in the annexed areas." He acknowledges that since Poles were not well acquainted with their Jewish neighbors, many fell prey to "easy generalizations."

Turning to the 20th century, he claims that "influential Jewish groups" on the left and right of the spectrum "openly opposed efforts to recreate an independent Poland." His explanation is not entirely plausible.

Indeed, several pages later he proclaims: "The Polish cause had the wholehearted support of the Jews who had assimilated to Polish language and culture, as well as of the local Orthodox Jews."

Although Pogonowski concedes that anti-Semitism was a problem in Poland after 1918, he claims that it never reached such heights, nor won the support of as large a sector of the population, as in Germany, Austria, Slovakia, Hungary, Romania and the Baltic states. Leaving Germany, Hungary and Austria aside, this is a tendentious assertion.

As for the Holocaust period, he claims that "there was no Polish complicity" in the Nazi genocide of the Jews. Needless to say, he is dead wrong.

However, Pogonowski is basically correct in pointing out that the major extermination camps were built in Poland largely because of its huge Jewish population, not because Poles were inherently anti-Semitic.

Pogonowski's discussion of communism in Poland is instructive. A disproportionate number of Jewish communists were involved in the administration of the country immediately after the war. Yet few Poles, he says, noticed that the Communist party and the secret police were largely staffed by Poles.

* * *

By examining and comparing Polish and Jewish literary reflections, Magdalena Opalski and Israel Bartal zero in on the superficial flowering of Polish-Jewish fellowship during the Polish rebellion against Russian colonialism in the 1860s.

Jewish participation in the revolt delighted Poles, although many Poles greeted it with disbelief and surprise. The authors contend that, in the main, Jewish participants were members of the intelligentsia and bourgeoisie most exposed to Polish cultural influences.

By the end of the 19th century, the image of the patriotic Jew — which had been partly disseminated by assimilated Jews or Poles of Jewish ancestry — had long faded. And in the popular imagination, Jews were accused of having profited economically from the uprising.

So much for the brotherhood of man.

A painting by Aleksander Lesser in which Jews and Poles commemorate the death of fighters in the 1860s rebellion against Russia. It highlights a brief moment of brotherhood in the often rancorous relationship between Jews and Poles.

The Jewish World

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Entertainment is a big business — a multi-billion dollar industry — in North America, and Jews, I think it is fair to say, have played a substantial role in the development of film, television, theatre and radio, media which have enriched the lives of millions.

In this fiercely competitive business, a handful of entertainers reach for stardom and attain it by dint of personality. Such persons, who possesses the magnetic power to move disparate audiences, are compararatively rare.

One such individual is Milton Berle, who turned 86 on July 12. Berle, whose real name was Milton Berlinger, is the elder statesman of stand-up comedy, along with Bob Hope, Sid Caesar and George Burns. But Berle, who was recently the subject of A&E TV's Biography series, is more than a slick, fast talking comic.

Berle revolutionized television as we know it today. He popularized the medium in an era when it was not respected. He made the masses pay attention to that little box in the living room.

When he started in television in 1948, Berle was already an accomplished performer, a vaudevillian who had churned out a slew of movies and had starred on radio. Berle showed courage and daring by plunging into television, since it was still somewhat of an experimental medium. No performer of his calibre wanted to work in television. Such was its reputation.

But Berle, who became known as Mr. Television, was not deterred. He signed on as the host of Texaco Star Theatre, which, in retrospect, was TV's first hit, the number one television show for four consecutive years, the program which was instrumental in making TV a powerful medium.

Statistics tell the tale. In his first year with Texaco Star Theatre, to which he brought enviable reserves of energy and vitality, 500,000 TV sets were sold in the United States. Several years later, millions were being bought yearly.

A great entertainer

It was essentially left to Berle to iron out "the kinks" which early television had exhibited, and in this task he succeeded brilliantly. Poised and self-assured, Berle was a wisecracking, motor-mouth comedian who could take the pulse of viewers and satisfy them. Texaco Star Theatre was vital and visual and appealing. Uncle Miltie, as he was dubbed, knew "every trick in the book." Or, as funnyman Alan King put it, "There was nothing Milton couldn't do."

As a boy, growing up in Montreal in the 1950s, I was too young to appreciate Berle's subtleties. Besides, my parents did not buy a TV set until I was about nine years old, which meant that I was at the mercy of friends and neighbors whenever I was seized by the desire to watch television.

Once we had our own set, I discovered that Berle was a constant and often refreshing presence on TV, with shows running the gamut from The Buick Berle Show to the Kraft Music Hall. More often than not, Berle tickled my fancy and, I might add, he was never boring.

As I learned from A&E's profile, Berle was born in New York City, the precocious fourth son of Moses and Sarah Berlinger. When he was only five years old, Berle won a talent contest, and by the time he was eight, he was a veteran of the silent screen. Berle appeared in a roster of films, including Tillie's Punctured Romance, with Charles Chaplin; Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm, with Mary Pickford; and The Mark of Zorro, with Douglas Fairbanks, Sr.

After starring in the Broadway musical Florodora, he began doing comic routines in vaudeville, earning up to $25,000 per week, then an astonishingly fabulous sum. Having established himself in radio, Berle went to Hollywood in the late 1930s, and performed in a number of forgettable movies like Tall, Dark and Handsome and Sun Valley Serenade. Back on Broadway and radio in the 1940s, Berle was matched up with television, and never looked back.

With his brash, flip style, Berle adapted quickly to TV, becoming one of its pioneers. In 1984, he was the first performer to be inducted into the TV Hall of Fame. A hard-driving man, he was not a Mr. Nice Guy in real life. But if nothing else, he was a consummate professional who foreshadowed the contemporaray sitcom.

Rabbinical Reflections

By RABBI AARON LEVINE

This week's sidrah contains the famous verse of our faith: Shema Yisraeil, HaShem Elokeinu, HaShem echad — Hear, O Israel, HaShem is our God, HaShem is the One and Only.

I have translated the verse as above to reflect two basic ideas. 1) God is One — there are no parts, there are no other units. He is indivisible. 2) At this point in history, HaShem is our God, not universally acknowledged, but ultimately all will recognize Him as the One and Only God.

It is well known that the word Hashem in Hebrew represents God's midas harachamim, His attribute of Mercy, while the word Elokim (or Elokeinu) represents God's midas hadin, His attribute of stern justice. How do we reconcile the two being in the same verse, particularly two words next to one another, and why does HaShem precede and follow Elokeinu?

I would like to explain this using a beautiful thought told to me by the great Maggid of Jerusalem, Rabbi Sholom Schwadron. I have printed it in my recently published book To Comfort the Bereaved.

The Ramban (the great talmudic scholar and kabbalist, Nachmanides) went to visit a young student who was very ill. When he came into the room he told the student that since he [the student] was a tzaddik, a righteous person, he was going to be elevated in Heaven and transported from one heichal (sphere) to another.

When he was to enter a particular sphere the Ramban instructed him to say: "I would like to ask a question." The student asked what question he was to ask, and the Ramban answered that he should ask, "Why did I have to die so young?"

The student died and appeared soon after to the Ramban [in either a dream or through another medium].

The Ramban asked, "So did they take you from this sphere to that one, as I had indicated?" "Yes," replied the student. "And did you come to that particular sphere that I spoke about?" "Yes," replied the student. "And did you ask the question that I asked you to ask?" "No," replied the student. "And why not?" queried the Ramban. "Because I did not want to embarrass my Rebbe [meaning the Ramban himself]," answered the student.

And he explained: "You see, Rebbe, on the door of that sphere are inscribed the following words — Dimenu Elokim chasdecha bekerev heichalecha — We have hoped, O God, for your kindness in the midst of your sphere (sanctuary) (Psalms 48:10). Now we know that the term Elokim is used when referring to the midas hadin, the attribute of the stern and strict justice of God. According to this simple translation of the verse would it not have been more appropriate . . . have used the word HaShem, God's attribute of kindness? The answer is that we can interpret the verse in another way altogether, putting the comma after Elokim, and translating the word dimenu, not as hope, but rather from the word nidmeh, what appears to us. Thus the meaning would be: What appears to us (what we think) is Elokim, God's stern justice, we now clearly see, when entering this sphere, is rather in reality, Your kindness, O God."

Using this explanation we can now interpret our verse of Shema Yisrael and we say the following: Hear O Israel, both the attributes of HaShem and Elokeinu are in reality attributes of HaShem — there is no way we can ever ascribe to God cruelty, injustice — in reality, it is ultimately all kindness.

Similarly we can now translate the famous first verse of this week's haftarah: "Nachman, nachamu ami yomar Elokeichem — Take comfort, take comfort, my nation, says your God." The word nachum, commonly translated as comfort, can also mean to change one's mind, similar to the verse (Genesis 6:6) — vayinachem HaShem ki asah es ha'adam — and HaShem regretted (changed His mind, kivyachol) that He had made man.

In this way Isaiah the Prophet is proclaiming in the name of God: I will ultimately comfort you from all of the trials and tribulations of the bitter galus, exile, by changing your minds and demonstrating that ultimately all of these were for the good. Even Elokeichem, God's attributes of stern justice will be proven to have been chesed, the kindness of HaShem, and you will ultimately be comforted.

May He so demonstrate this to us speedily in our days. Amen!

Berlin Jewish community seeking Conservative rabbis

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BERLIN — Help wanted: Two rabbis needed in major metropolitan city, one for a Conservative synagogue, the other to coordinate youth programs. Salary well above average pay at American synagogues. Women need not apply. Professional requirements: Must speak German and be willing to live in Germany.

The last requirement may well provide the Jewish community of Berlin with difficulties as it seeks a replacement for Rabbi Ernst Stein, who ran the Conservative Pestalozzistrasse Synagogue for the past 14 years before retiring earlier this summer.

In a recent interview with JTA, Jerzy Kanal, head of Berlin's Jewish community, expressed confidence that the community's board of directors would find two candidates to fill the openings by the end of the year.

But he admitted that it will be an uphill battle to find rabbis who speak German and want to move to the German capital.

"Germany doesn't have the best image," Kanal conceded. "We receive lots of delegations from overseas, and there's hardly a delegation that doesn't ask us, 'How can you live here?' "

Kanal added that competition from other Western countries makes the Berlin community's search process more difficult.

"If a rabbi has a position in England or America, he isn't keen to come to Germany."

It's equally difficult to find native-born rabbis, he said, noting that in wealthy Germany, young Jews do not see a need to go into the rabbinate. If the economic situation here were worse, there would be more interest in religion, he claimed.

But the retired Rabbi Stein is more critical. He said the German Jewish communities, and Berlin in particular, are known among German-speaking rabbis as tough assignments.

The city's congregants, Rabbi Stein said, are more interested in political or business contacts they can obtain from membership in the community than they are in Judaism.

Court orders Droege released

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Federal Court of Appeal judge last week ordered the release from jail of white supremacists Wolfgang Droege and Gary Schipper pending their appeal of contempt of court citations.

Judge Louis Marceau attached several conditions to the release, including that Droege and Schipper file written undertakings that they would comply with the terms of a consent order prohibiting them from offering telephone hate messages.

Droege, who heads the racist Heritage Front, and Schipper, who used to be the voice on the Front's telephone hotline, were sentenced on June 22 for ignoring court orders that they cease offering telephone hate messages. Droege was sentenced to four months in jail, Schipper to two months and Heritage Front member Ken Barker to one month. Barker has already completed his sentence.

Rene Duval, senior counsel for the Canadian Human Rights Commission, said the commission did not oppose Droege's and Schipper's application that they be released pending appeal. But it did ask the court to attach several conditions to the release, including an order that they be prevented from broadcasting messages, setting up a hotline, associating with members of the Heritage Front and with commenting on any social or political issue.

The court turned down those requests, Duval said. However, it did require Droege and Schipper to proceed with their appeal expeditiously. Whether they are able to do so will depend on whether they are able to obtain Legal Aid funding for their case. Duval added that, in an affidavit filed with the court, Droege's lawyer Harry Doan said this could take up to two months.

Steven Shulman, associate director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, said the judicial "process will ultimately run its course on appeal. In the meantime, we expect the police will monitor the situation to ensure that, in the event that Droege and/or Schipper violate the terms of release, they will be apprehended."

Feinberg clinic receives JCC's bill

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The enthusiasm over the highly successful blood screening drive for Jay Feinberg has been tempered by the fact that the Jewish Community Centre, where the drive was held, charged the organizers $400.

Jack Feinberg, Jay's father, said that to his knowledge this is the first clinic in the world for which a charge has been levied.

Paul Brownstein, executive director of the Jewish Community Centre north branch told The CJN that the organizers came to the staff person responsible for renting facilities and asked what the rental fee was. On being told the amount, they immediately wrote a cheque.

The question of a subsidy or a free room was not brought to him, he said.

Brownstein is bitter about a community where "everyone feels they should come here and use the JCC for free. Everybody wants something for nothing.

"I agree that the community should be able to use the JCC for free," he said."But we have to pay our bills.

"Everyone criticizes us [for charging for facilities and for the financial bind the institution is in] but we can barely pay our salaries now."

The JCC "has lots of scars from the Jewish community," Brownstein said.

He noted wryly that "there is some pent-up emotion here."

Some differences matter more than others when funeral arrangements have to be made

There is a difference but it's not price

Benjamin's has been providing meaningful, dignified funeral services for three generations. The real difference isn't price. It's the lasting value of experience, and the caring personal service every family receives at Benjamin's.

On the other hand, there's usually very little difference in cost between chapels. Regardless. The price for identical products and services may vary slightly, but there's no comparison in quality.

According to families who have experienced it firsthand, these differences mean everything.

Israeli scouts delight crowds

TORONTO — Against a backdrop of interwoven Israeli, American and Canadian flags, 10 Israeli scouts wowed a crowd of over 600 at a concert last month.

The Israel Scouts Friendship Caravan 1994, made up of five boys, five girls and two leaders, was on a coast-to-coast North American tour. In Toronto they performed at Esther Shiner Stadium and Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care. Other Canadian stops included Montreal, Ottawa, Kingston and Niagara Falls.

The Toronto program, which received a standing ovation, included the Israel Scout Song Shir Hatzorim and Shir HaShalom, the Song of Peace.

The visit was sponsored by the Jewish Advisory Committee on Scouting & Guiding and the Jewish Community Centre of Toronto. Peter Sawyer, regional commissioner of Scouts Canada, gave the 10 youngsters badges to help them remember their stay.

After the Toronto Baycrest show, one audience member who cannot speak passed on a note to the organizers. "Young & Lovely Girl & Boy Performers," it read, "Lovely to look at & a Delight to listen to/God Bless all Performers, we owe a Big Thank You/God Bless Those Responsible from a Grateful Resident."

In Montreal the Israeli scouts were hosted by Reuben R. Koffler, Shaar Hashomayim Scout Group and the Westmount District of Scouts Canada. They performed in Temple Emanu El for the community and in the senior citizen home Place Kensington.

In Ottawa the hosts were Howard Osterer, the 39th Henry "Hank" Torontow Scout Group and the J.C.C. of Ottawa. They performed for the community at an outdoor barbecue and at the Jewish Schools of Ottawa.

Beth Israel Congregation in Kingston hosted the troup for their two shows. The scouts spend Shabbat in Niagara Falls at a community Oneg Shabbat sponsored by B'nai Jacob Congregation.

"The Caravan is a credit to the world of Scouting and the best ambassadors Israel could have sent," said Robert Engel, chair of the National Jewish Advisory Committee on Scouting & Guiding.

Young Reform Jews launch new group

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Judaism meets Generation X.

Or more accurately, young (aged 19-30) Reform Jews, disenchanted with synagogue and other youth groups, are starting a Metro-wide organization aimed primarily at keeping members within the religious fold.

Organizers stress the group is not a dating or singles service but a place where young Reform Jews can congregate outside a synagogue setting for lectures and programs on religion, community service and social action.

But it won't be all work, says Tamara Fisher, who's starting the fledgling group with fellow Temple Har Zion member Andrew Consky.

Fisher, 23, envisions a relaxed environment in which both the Reform mind and the funny bone will be stimulated. She would like representation from all Reform congregations in and around Toronto, from singles as well as marrieds, university students and those just starting careers.

In the planning are a lecture series, entertainment programs — such as sporting events, movies and theme parties — fundraisers, weekend retreats and promotion of community service.

But the overall thrust, says Fisher, is keeping Reform Judaism alive and well among the younger set.

"It's a chance to rally with our own," she told The CJN. "It allows Reform Jews to interact with other Reform young adults from around the city, and get back to the faith."

Geographically, Reform has spread out. In the last year alone, congregations have sprung up in Durham and York regions, joining synagogues in Mississauga, Hamilton, Brampton and Kitchener, not to mention the three Reform temples in Metro, and Temple Har Zion and Temple Kol Ami, both in Thornhill.

Organizers also want the Reform Kolel involved.

Fisher said she helped start the group mainly for two reasons: the youth group at Har Zion, Ma'Avar, was "too cliqueish and too isolated from other synagogues." Add to that alarming rises in intermarriage and assimilation rates, and Fisher felt something should be done to get young Jews in the same room, interested in the same things.

Armed with an old list of members of North Eastern Lakes Federation of Temple Youth (NELFTY), the Reform movement's wing for teenagers, Fisher made a few calls and got "about 70 people as potential members right away."

She says there's potential for well over 100 members.

As Fisher and others see it, young Jews aged 19-22 are in the greatest danger of dropping out of religion. NELFTY's oldest members are 18, while universities are where many young people meet their future mates. And often, the first few years of work leave little time for matters spiritual.

Rabbi Daniel Gottlieb, executive director of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism (CCRJ) agrees.

The organized Jewish community has had the "least success" in maintaining contact with people between college and the workforce, he said.

He thinks the group is "a terrific idea" precisely because it attempts to reach out and connect with a vulnerable section of society.

Already, the as-yet unnamed organization has a program planned for August 13.

Winnipeg Legions honored

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Following the lead of the national organization, the Midwest region of the B'nai Brith League for Human Rights is awarding human rights citations to those Winnipeg branches of the Royal Canadian Legion that show respect for the traditions of others as well as their own.

Michael Lazar, Midwest region chair, reports that so far three or four local Legion branches have agreed to accept the citations.

Lazar reports that the League has surveyed Winnipeg's Legion branches about their policy concerning head coverings and found that seven favor the hats off policy; seven (including the primarily Jewish General Monash Branch) oppose it. Five others either had no policy or could not be reached for comment.

In one case, he says, the League is supporting local Sikh activist Kuldip Singh who is taking the Elmond Legion branch before the Manitoba Human Rights Commission after Singh phoned the branch and was told that he was not welcome wearing his turban.

"We have had consultations with The World Sikh Organization and the Khalsa Diwan Society of Manitoba about contingency plans," Lazar says. "If things go well, I hope we won't have to take any further action."

Hamilton UJA chair ends term

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — As CeCe Schreiber winds up her two-year term as Hamilton's United Jewish Appeal (UJA) chair, she has much to be proud of.

Dedicated, methodical and very much a "hands-on" person, Hamilton's first-ever woman campaign chair ran a campaign that involved many new members of the community and brought in many new contributors.

It also resulted in an overall increase of eight per cent in campaign contributions — no mean feat considering the depressed economy and its effect on this industry dependent city.

"The point of the exercise," Schreiber said in a recent interview, "was to reach everyone in the community." With the help of "126 really good canvassers," she set about doing just that.

Material about UJA and letters explaining "why it is important to be part of the campaign" went out to the entire community. There were videos both for past donors and those who had never been canvassed.

There were also polite calls to those donors who could not contribute as they had in the past. "You have to have empathy for people in every situation," she said of the strategy.

Schreiber's campaign also looked to cash in on pledges made years ago but never honored. "Pledges are wonderful, but you can't run a community on pledges."

Hand-addressed invoices with a personal note from a board member will, she hopes, aid in collecting these pledges.

Schreiber said the campaign was particularly successful in "creating a new awareness. People will respond if you present them with the information." She said she most enjoyed learning about new contributors.

Some of those new contributors were immigrants from the former Soviet Union. Schreiber said she was touched to see those who have been in Hamilton for barely a year reach out to their even more recently arrived compatriots.

Negev Dinner honors Taubs

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

WINDSOR — Hate crime legislation does not work, according to lawyer Alan Dershowitz, who told a Windsor audience recently that in his opinion Canada's experiment with hate crime laws has been a failure.

The famed U.S. civil rights lawyer and author of the best selling Chutzpa! was in Windsor to address the Jewish National Fund (JNF) Negev Tribute Dinner in honor of Harold and Paula Taub.

A record 500 guests attended the dinner at the Caboto Club, the largest attendance ever in the 23-year history of this JNF event here.

Bringing hatemongers and Holocaust deniers such as Jim Keegstra and Ernst Zundel to trial will not work, Dershowitz said, because the resulting court cases and media coverage will give them a far wider audience and more publicity than they would otherwise have enjoyed.

In an interview with the Windsor Star, Dershowitz was quoted as saying "the answer to hate mongers is giving them enough rope to hang themselves."

Prominent Windsor lawyer Harold Taub and his wife Paula were honored for their many years of dedicated community service and leadership.

Joseph Eisenber, the retired executive director of the Windsor Jewish Federation, presented the Negev citation to Harold, while Fred Katzman, a past president of Congregation Beth El, presented the citation to Paula.

Accepting the honor with "deepest humility," Taub said "the greatest honor was having the opportunity afforded to us to raise money for a cause we love and believe so strongly in."

And in her response, Paula said their numerous communal and Israel involvements have given the couple a bonus of many lasting and special friendships.

She closed her remarks with the hope that many ot the young people present would remain a strong force for future Jewish generations both at home and in Israel.

Emcee for the evening was Marcey Katzman; co-campaign chairs were Windsor JNF president Jerry Goldberg, Alan Ackerman, Gary Katz and Rabbi Jonathan Plaut.

Dr. Sharon Marcovitz Hart, president of Hamilton JNF, brought greetings on behalf of JNF National board of directors, and Dennis Archer and Michael Hurst, the mayors of Detroit and Windsor, brought greetings on behalf of their cities.

The honorees' 7-year-old granddaughter, Elana Ackerman, assisted by Cantor Sidney Resnick of Congregation Beth El, led guests in the singing of O Canada and Hatikvah.

Proceeds from the dinner will go towards the greening of Mount Scopus in Jerusalem.

Groundbreaking ceremony held for Moshav Noam housing co-operative

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

David Peltz, Valerie Hyman and MP Joseph Volpe tip dirt into the Moshav Noam cooperative housing project excavation site.

TORONTO — The Moshav Noam cooperative housing project was already underway, but that didn't stop last month's groundbreaking ceremony from going ahead.

Two months after construction began on the housing project at Lawrence Avenue and Bathurst Street, moshav board president Valerie Hyman stood beside the gaping hole and handed out hardhats and shovels for tipping dirt into the excavation site.

"It's a symbolic groundbreaking," she said.

The $15-million building should be finished by the spring of 1995.

More than 40 people were on hand for the groundbreaking, including area MP Joseph Volpe. Many were members of the Reconstructionist Congregation Darchei Noam, whose social action committee pushed for the mixed-income project.

"It takes 4½ years and a lot of people to make an event like this [happen]," Hyman told the crowd.

The nine-member moshav board was incorporated in 1990. The moshav purchased the land next to Bathurst Place seniors' building for $2.8 million in December, and secured a guaranteed mortgage through the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

The mortgage on the mixed-income building will be paid off through government subsidies, said development consultant Dan Fast.

Sixty per cent of the building's 142 units will be subsidized, Hyman said. She wants the building to be a "community of friends."

Isaac Hadida, 68, will be part of that community when he moves into a one-bedroom apartment next spring. He said he was attracted to the moshav because "[it is] exactly like the kibbutz in Israel. We split the same happiness and the same joy.

"I am looking forward to being with all the people here," he said.

Swastika found cut in lawn

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Don and Joyce Schaeffer came from a Canada Day picnic to find someone had carved a swastika and a Magen David into their front lawn.

Inside the swastika was a piece of cardboard with an obscene message.

"It left me with a strange feeling," said Don Schaeffer. "We have had anti-Semitic incidents in the past but nothing like this."

Originally from New York, the Schaeffers moved to Winnipeg in 1975 and settled in Transcona, an area with very few Jewish residents. They are members of the Reform Temple Shalom and were active in the B'nai Brith League for Human Rights, midwestern region.

Although Joyce Schaeffer said she thinks she knows who was responsible, Winnipeg police have no suspects as yet.

District 4 Superintendent Graham Stewart said the Hate Crimes Unit has spoken to the Schaeffers and their neighbors, viewed the lawn and made enquiries but that no one saw or heard anything.

"We are doing the best we can," Stewart said, "but right now we have no leads."

Kolel's kallah set for Orillia

TORONTO — Kolel's third annual national study kallah will get underway next week in Orillia.

The five-day retreat, which runs from July 27 to 31 at the Geneva Park Conference Centre, is sponsored by Kolel: A Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, the adult education section of the Canadian Council for Reform Judiasm.

Kallah organizer Rabbi Elyse Goldstein said over 80 people have signed up for the retreat, up from 63 last year.

Participants will study and discuss with faculty rabbis such topics as the Ten Commandments, chassidic literature, and Ruth and Esther as feminist heroes.

They can also learn more about Israeli dances, genealogy and how to tell stories.

For more information about the kallah, call Rabbi Goldstein at (905) 660-3154.

McLeod comes out swinging at nomination meeting

Kwinter nominated

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It was a Liberal love-in last week at Ontario's most "Jewish" riding, as the hand of Wilson Heights MPP Monte Kwinter was hoisted in the air by the woman who appeared confident of becoming the province's next premier.

Liberal leader Lyn McLeod was present at Kwinter's nomination meeting — a formality, as no one opposed the popular MPP — and both used the occasion to lambaste the governing NDP, as well as the Tories.

Kwinter told party and riding faithful that Ontarians will soon get the election they've been waiting for.

While rumors of a late autumn or early winter vote swirl about Queen's Park, Kwinter said "most" observers agree a provincial election will be held next spring.

Kwinter said Conservative leader Mike Harris spent $600,000 to promote the Tories' "Common Sense Revolution" of tax cuts and fiscal restraint, only to see the Conservatives lose four points in their popularity rating.

Current standings, according to Kwinter, are 60 per cent support for the Liberals, 21 per cent for the Conservatives and 12 per cent for the NDP.

Kwinter is one of four Jewish MPPs — three on the Liberal side and one Tory, Willowdale's Charles Harnick.

Also present at Kwinter's nod for Wilson Heights' Liberal candidate was Howard Shore, who's seeking the Liberal nomination in Willowdale. Earlier this year, Shore's Markham home was defaced with spray-painted swastikas and messages warning him to quit the race. Shore has stayed in the running, against former Willowdale MPP Gino Matrundola.

McLeod acknowledged Shore's presence.

The Liberal leader also slammed NDP policies, and spelled out her party's fiscal priorities: 150,000 more jobs than the New Democrats would create; a five per cent tax cut and a 50 per cent reduction in government regulations.

To cheers, McLeod promised stiffer gun control laws and health care with no user fees.

Jewish hockey rookie gets drafted to Florida

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sitting in the Hartford Civic Centre during the recent NHL entry draft, David Nemirovsky began to feel a little impatient as the day wore on.

Perhaps it's indicative of his high level of self confidence or of the solid season he had just completed, but he admits to being disappointed that his name wasn't called until the fourth round, 84th overall, by the Florida Panthers.

A rookie rightwinger with the Ottawa 67s last season, Nemirovsky, who turns 18 in August, had been projected by Central Scouting as a second round pick — quite a jump for someone who played with the North York Rangers in the Metro Toronto junior league a scant two years ago.

Despite the disappointment of going so "late" in the draft, Nemirovsky is happy to have been chosen by Florida. "It's a young team, a building team so I figure I'll have better opportunities there," he said.

Something of a rookie sensation, Nemirovsky took a regular shift and impressed the 67s coaches early. For the first half of the season, they had him playing on the team's number one line with Mike Peca (a Canuck draftee) and Curtis Bowen (picked by Detroit), both of whom were members of Canada's world junior championship team.

In the second half of the season, Nemirovsky skated with centre Alain McCauley and winger Steve Washburn, who was drafted by Florida the year before.

An offensive fireplug, Nemirovsky's point totals were solid. In 63 games, he bulged the twine 22 times and added 32 assists for 56 points, despite playing hurt part of the season with injured ligaments in his left wrist.

In the Ontario Hockey League playoffs, Nemirovsky picked up the scoring pace, registering 10 goals and 10 assists in 17 games, including four power-play markers and one game-winner.

Analyzing his strengths and weaknesses, Nemirovsky believes his strongest points are his skating, playmaking and goal-scoring abilities. At the same time, he acknowledges that to shore up his game, he has to get stronger. At six foot two, 185 lbs., he hopes to put on another 10-15 lbs. so he doesn't get pushed around by the NHL's heavyweights.

Peter Lee, who has moved from assistant to the 67s' head coaching job with the retirement of Brian Kilrea, said, "David has a good offensive touch around the net, good instincts. He needs to work on his defensive [game]. He shows flashes of being a really good skater but he needs to work hard on every shift. He has a lot of potential [but] he's still a little green."

Although he's going to camp hoping to make the Panthers, Nemirovsky says he won't be too disappointed if he's sent back to junior for more seasoning. If that's his fate, he says he'll set his sights on making Canada's world junior team.

Heady goals for any hockey player — particularly for the son of immigrants from Odessa in the former Soviet Union. His father, Semyon, played elite level soccer in the Soviet Union as well as hockey. Nemirovsky readily admits the Russian influence in his game, even though he was born in Canada.

"I think I have the best of both worlds," he said. "My skill is at a Russian level and the heart is that of a Canadian."

Elite league

His brother, Michael, 19, seems to have an even stronger affinity with Russian-style hockey. Last July, he moved to Moscow to play for Spartak in the elite league. But by November the political situation became too unstable and he decided to return to Canada where he caught on with Chicoutimi of the Quebec Major Junior Hockey League.

He played centre on a line with Alexei Lojkin, a native of Minsk, and Christian Caron, and the unit quickly established itself as the team's finesse outfit. In 30 games over a three-month span, Michael scored 18 goals and had 18 assists before he broke his wrist and had to leave the lineup.

A dandy stickhandler with Kent Nilsson-like moves, Michael (six feet 185 lbs.) says he felt that going from the Russian elite league to Junior A was like "going from playing with men at a high level where I had to push myself to a much easier level."

Six of his Spartak teammates were chosen in the draft and he predicts that right-winger Alexander Selvanov, Philadelphia's sixth-round pick, will make the Flyers because he's strong, skilled and has a bit of a mean streak — perfect for the NHL.

Michael is undrafted but he says he's already had two offers to attend NHL training camps as a free agent.

Correction

In the article, Feinberg's hopes rest with new clinic (CJN June 30), the anecdote about the donor who sent a teddy bear to the infant recipient of her bone marrow was based on faulty information.

Debbie Litwin-Malek of Ottawa, the donor, told The CJN that she was tested at a clinic for an Ottawa child suffering from leukemia, not for Feinberg. She was later contacted by the Unrelated Bone Marrow Registry to assist another child.

Her sister, who lives in Toronto, told her of hearing about a bone marrow recipient who had received a teddy bear.

Litwin-Malek has since met the family — and the teddy bear.

The child she gave the marrow to is doing well.

Israeli skaters hope to play junior hockey

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Bellingham, Wash., is a long way from Krasnoyarsk, Siberia but the U.S. West Coast is where 18-year-old Eugene (Evgeny) Feldman is hoping his career will take him this summer.

Feldman, along with Boris Amromin, 19, and Alexander (Sasha) Stolyar, 17½, are three Soviet-born athletes hoping to crack the lineup of the Bellingham Hawks, a tier II junior A team located just south of the British Columbia border near Vancouver.

Although the presence of Soviet-born players on junior hockey teams is becoming less of a rarity these days, it's unlikely that any junior squad can boast an Israeli connection as well. That's because, in addition to sharing a Soviet birthplace, the three young athletes are also Israeli citizens who have laced up their skates to play for the country's national team.

Israeli head coach Gideon Lee, who is based in Toronto, believes the Washington trio, along with 17-year-old Sabra skater Ran Oz, represent the future core of talent for the national team.

With that in mind, Lee, along with the team's assistant coach Marshall Uretsky, arranged for the three Soviet-born players to get tryouts with the Hawks. Oz, meanwhile, is aiming for a spot on one of Toronto's AAA midget teams this year. He hopes to follow that up with a stint in junior B and then perhaps earn a scholarship to an American university.

Lee believes the top Israeli players need North American competition and training to develop their skills.

Despite the Mediterranean climate of the Jewish state, the foursome are die-hard hockey enthusiasts who live to play the game. In Toronto to hone their skills before training camp, they practice with a handful of other junior prospects at a north Toronto rink under the watchful eye of Mike Lende, a professional hockey instructor who has coached the Toronto Marlie Midgets for the past two seasons.

Lende has them perform a variety of drills to improve their skill level. In the brief time he's seen the Israelis skate, he likes what he sees. Amromin and Feldman play at a junior B level now, he said, while Stolyar, who needs to work on his skating and game awareness, might be more comfortable at a juvenile AAA level.

Game experience

He's high on Oz's potential, noting that he only began skating a few years ago. "He's got all the tools, he just needs game experience," Lende said.

Out on the ice, the foursome did not look out of place practicing and scrimmaging with several junior A players. Feldman, a 5 foot 10, 160-lb. centre who plays for Haifa in the Israeli league, believes he's ready to play junior A hockey. He's not concerned about the North American physical game.

Stolyar, a native of Kiev who also plays for Haifa, hasn't played at a North American level of competition for quite a while and is concerned about getting into game shape. Like his buddies, his dream is to make a career for himself as a hockey player.

Amromin, who was born in Kharkov and who also plays for Haifa, said the difference between the Israeli league and the Toronto practice was huge. "It's a different level," he said. Up to age 16 when he went on aliyah, he played in the top hockey league in Ukraine, he said.

Unlike his Israeli teammates, Oz learned his hockey in the Jewish state. But like them, his ultimate goal is to play professional hockey. At 6 foot 2 and 210 lbs., he's got the size to play defence in the big league and he likes the physical game. But he knows he has to work hard and improve all aspects of his game, especially his skating and his game experience.

* * *

Sharing the ice with the Israeli skaters was Daryl Grist, a 17-year-old whose mother is Jewish. Grist played last season for the Toronto Marlies in the MTHL and the year before that for Don Mills Flyers.

This past summer, the 5 foot 11, 175-lb. centre was drafted by Ottawa 67s of the Ontario Hockey League (OHL).

Daryl Grist

With a shot at major junior hockey ahead of him, Grist has devoted his summer to getting his game in top shape. In addition to skating under Lende's supervision, he'll attend a hockey camp and devote a lot of time to dry land training.

A good skater who counts playmaking among his top skills, Grist said his dream since he was 4 was to play in the NHL.

* * *

At the ripe old age of 24, Mike Lende has already racked up some impressive credentials as a hockey and skating coach. Head man with the Marlie Midgets the past two seasons, Lende has also privately tutored OHL players as well as some professionals during the summer months. This past season he was up at 6 a.m. every morning to coach Ryerson's varsity team in skill development.

His expertise at coaching can be traced back to his school days at York University where he took psychology. "When everyone was studying for exams, I was studying hockey," he recalled.

Lende pursued his interest in coaching at Colorado College. He also travelled to Europe where he studied coaching and skating techniques.

Self-taught as a hockey instructor, Lende along with his brother Danny opened the Hockey Academy, a summer school for hockey enthusiasts.

The four-year-old school has held camps in Nova Scotia, Whitby, Richmond Hill and Sweden. He recently sold his half-interest to his brother, but continues to instruct.

Lende said he has adapted a variety of European skating drills to teach bigger players quickness and mobility. "It's like ballet on ice or figure skating," he said. "The key concept is edgework."

Lee recruited him to help get the Israeli skaters into top shape for their upcoming tryout camps. His biggest challenge will be to help "teach them mechanically how to maintain possession of the puck while being hit, and game awareness. They're going to have to get used to seeing the whole ice," he said.

Mike Lende

Women raise over $1m

VANCOUVER — The Women's Division of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver raised more than $1 million in the recent Combined Jewish Appeal campaign, according to division chair Hilary Benson.

The $1,001,653 raised was eight per cent more than the $925,800 raised the previous year. Benson said the funds represented 25 per cent of the total dollars raised in the 1993 campaign. There were 2,428 women donors.

"A woman's gift used to be a small token over and above the family's collective pledge," Benson said. "Today, with the radical changes in women's roles in society, our communal role and financial responsibility has also changed dramatically.

Funds raised support 19 local agencies and programs as well as the United Israel Appeal, Benson said.

Volunteer named to Order of Canada

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

Edith Lando

VANCOUVER — A pioneer resident of Vancouver, Edith Lando, has been appointed a Member of the Order of Canada (OC).

Lando, 77, will receive the honor for voluntary service at a ceremony in Ottawa in October.

Born in Winnipeg, Lando, the widow of a lawyer, has four children and 10 grandchildren. She became active in the Jewish and general community almost immediately after moving here in 1938.

Educated in Winnipeg, New York, Cologne and Los Angeles, she won the City of Vancouver Centennial Award for Outstanding Pioneers and was 1986 nominee for the YMCA Women of Distinction Award.

Currently she is on the steering committee for Western Gold, a new program which will coach, direct and provide acting opportunities for actors and actresses over the age of 60.

She has supported a number of Israeli institutions — Ben Gurion, Tel Aviv, Hebrew, Bar Ilan universities; Canadian Friends of Amal to raise funds for disadvantaged young Israelis; and Peace Now.

Her work for Bar Ilan included initiating and endowing a 10-year research study at that university for the improvements of relations between Arabs and Jews.

Lando was the first chair of the United Jewish Appeal Women's Division, was on the advisory board of the State of Israel Bonds organization, on the board of the men's Youth Aliyah campaign and program chair of Beth Israel Synagogue Sisterhood.

She initiated, organized and ran a gift shop for patients at Louis Brier Home for the elderly; and organized and co-funded a children's art exhibit in Vancouver from the Givat Haviva Educational Institution in Israel, which is dedicated to fostering good relations between Arab and Israel children.

Last year she organized and held a fundraiser for Children of the World, an association which focuses on child welfare and which at present concentrates on children's institutions in Romania.

Lando was the first president of the Greater Vancouver Child Abuse Prevention Society and chaired a workshop on Child Abuse and Neglect at an international conference in Salsburg, Austria.

She has established the Edith Lando Charitable Foundation, providing gifts for a wide range of interests. Innovative programs, usually in the area of child welfare, are preferred, she said.

At 77, said Lando, she still feels there is much work to do and will continue with her voluntary activities.

SEND-OFF FOR ONTARIO TEENS

Twenty-six Jewish teenagers from small Ontario communities got a high-profile send-off last week before departing for a five-week tour of Isreal. Summer's the time to get corn(y)

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

We love corn on the cob in this house. We make whole meals around it. Face it, any good food that is this easy to make has got to be perfect.

I discovered this in my 20s, shortly after I was married. On a quest for the perfect ear of corn, I discovered something. If you stand in the middle of a corn field on a hot summer day you can hear it growing. This original city girl was amazed. Up to this point I thought corn came from the grocery store. I figured they grew it somewhere in the back of the building.

Most people just husk their corn, throw it in their pot or microwave and cook it within an inch of soggy. Don't do that. All the corn needs is 7 to 8 minutes at a rolling boil or 3 to 4 minutes per ear in the microwave. It should still be crisp when it comes out. You can roast it on the grill for 10 to 12 minutes with the husk on and the silk removed. It takes a little work but its wonderful. (Brush the ear with a little butter or margarine before you pull the husks back up.)

Eating the corn right off the cob is a great way to enjoy it. In fact, that's where most people stop. I, however, have collected some really great recipes that use corn from the cob in unconventional ways. Some of them take a little work but they're worth it. So if you have a few extra ears or you just feel like experimenting have fun. Just a note, 2 large ears of corn equal 1 cup.

CUCUMBER CORN CHOWDER

1 lb. cucumbers, cut into small cubes
1 tbsp. chopped dill (fresh is best)
1 medium leek, chopped
1 oz. butter
2 cups milk
1 cup corn
1/2 oz. corn starch
2 tbsp. water
2 yolks, beaten
2/3 c. sour cream
1/2 c. whipped sweet cream

Saute dill and leeks in butter for about 2 minutes at a low temp. Add the cucumbers and cook for 5 minutes more, stirring often. Add milk and corn kernels and simmer for 20 mins. Dissolve the cornstarch in the water and add, stirring until thick. Remove from heat.

Beat yolks and sour cream together. Add a little of the corn mixture to the yolk mixture, stir and then add the yolk mixture to the soup. Serve at once and top with a dollop of whip cream. Croutons go great with this.

CORN WALNUT DIP

2 packages (8 oz. each) softened cream cheese
¼ cup vegetable oil
¼ cup lime juice
1 tbsp. ground red chilies
1 tbsp. ground cumin
½ tsp. salt
dash pepper
1¼ cup corn
1 c. chopped walnuts
1 small onion, chopped

In a mixing bowl beat together all the ingredients except the corn, walnuts and onion. When the rest of the ingredients are blended, stir in the corn walnuts and onion. Serve with tortilla chip or piece of pita.

AVOCADO CORN SALAD

3 cups cooked brown rice
1 avocado
1 cup corn
½ cup toasted almonds
1 small onion, finely chopped
2 tsp. lemon juice
2 tsp. olive oil
2 tsp. vinegar
2 tsp. soy sauce
lettuce

Cook brown rice according to the directions and set aside to cool. Peel and pit the avocado and chop into small pieces. Add the avocado, corn, almonds and onion into the rice. Mix very well. Combine the lemon juice, oil, vinegar and soy sauce together. Mix well and pour over the rice mixture. Mix, refrigerate for several hours and serve over lettuce.

Sunnybrook auction planned to raise funds for research

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The high quality of care was what first attracted Nani and Austin Beutel to volunteer their time and effort to the Sunnybrook Health Science Centre.

Nani Beutel is co-chair — with Anne Marie Canning — of the fourth annual Sunnybrook Fantasy Auction to raise funds for research. It will take place on Sept. 22 at the McLean Estate on the Sunnybrook grounds, beginning at 6 p.m.

The reception will feature a Dutch Honor Guard and the costumed hostesses will serve Dutch foods. The event is under the patronage of the consul-general of Netherlands, Dominique V. F. J. Baudin.

"Auctions are excellent fundraising vehicles," says Beutel. They entertain while they support.

Guests can also purchase trips for two, including being guests at a California vineyard, cruising on a private yacht in the Caribbean, or touring the gardens of Holland.

The last three auctions have raised three-quarters of a million dollars and Beutel hopes to reach one million this year. "We extend an invitation to the entire community to join us," she says.

She also stresses that "the McLean Estate exists for the community to use, as well as for our own events."

Sunnybrook, which is closely affiliated with the University of Toronto, is a teaching hospital for the U of T's School of Medicine. It is one of the largest hospitals in Canada with about 1300 beds and some 4,000 employees. Approximately 18,000 patients stayed in the acute care facilities last year, while outpatient visits to clinics and the Emergency Department totalled more than 325,000.

The Sunnybrook Health Science Centre houses six programs linked to areas of major clinical concern: aging, medical physics, clinical epidemiology, oncology, trauma and general research.

Austin and Nani Beutel

"These research programs have been phenomenally successful in many respects but still require funding to cover the costs of building and equipping the laboratories in the new Reichmann Research Building," says Beutel. "None of these projects are government funded."

Presently, there are a number of innovative studies being pursued at Sunnybrook, including digital mammography (computerized images of the breast), and MRI-guided patient therapy (minimally invasive therapy to patients).

The Beutels moved to Toronto from Montreal 16 years ago. The family has a tradition of volunteer service. Austin Beutel's father, Ben, was president of the United Talmud Torahs, the largest Jewish day school system in Montreal.

Nani Beutel's early volunteer interest was in the area of education, the field in which she was trained.

In Toronto, Nani Beutel became involved in a number of organizations, notably with the Toronto chapter, Juvenile Diabetes Foundation.

The Beutels both serve on a number of executive boards. Austin is a past president of Temple Sinai where Nani is a board member, and they are active in the Canadian Council of Reform Judaism. The Beutels are officers of the Toronto chapter of Ben Gurion University and serve on the board of the World Union of Progressive Judaism.

Nani Beutel recalls that she and her husband were first introduced to Sunnybrook Hospital by Martin and Carol Barkin when they met at Temple Sinai. Martin was the former president and CEO of the hospital.

"We learned what an outstanding facility Sunnybrook is," she says. "We wanted to contribute our efforts to a hospital where the staff members are so committed. Everyone we met talked about the high standard of care they and their families had received at Sunnybrook, despite its size."

Beutel believes that it is the high quality of care that brings out the commitment from volunteers. She notes with pride that Austin is chair of the Board of Trustees at Sunnybrook."

Tu b'Av singles bash planned

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — By now, July 28 must be marked on at least 500 calendars belonging to Jewish singles.

On that date, the Jewish Community Centre's (JCC) New Leadership program will host Toronto's sixth annual Tu b'Av festival party — a modern-day singles bash based on an ancient ritual.

In the days of the Second Temple, young single women danced in the vineyards outside Jerusalem on the festival of Tu b'Av (the fifteenth day of Av), while young single men chose their wives from the array of dancers.

This year, over 1,000 singles between the ages of 18 and 55 are expected to attend the evening event at the JCC North Y branch. As of last week, almost 450 tickets had been sold.

The party will take place under a tent in the outdoor field near the tennis courts.

"I've had people calling me since January, wanting to know the date of the party," said Rosanne Zarnett, North Y branch program director.

The event has been advertised extensively in several cities including Detroit, London, Buffalo, Montreal and even Boca Raton, Florida. Three people are coming in from Miami, Zarnett said.

The cost of each ticket ($18 in advance; $25 at the door) will include a selection of JCC coupons worth $100, a kosher barbeque (hot dogs, hamburgers and veggie burgers) and a varied entertainment menu.

The Rick Levine Band and Times Square Entertainment, magician Allan Nackan, and Yuk Yuk's comedians Greg Eckler and Michael Gelbart will be on hand to enhance the festivities, which will run from 7:30 to 12:30.

Door prizes include an outfit from Danier Leather, and two tickets for Showboat donated by Metro Toronto Singles.

Money raised at the party will be put toward programming for Jewish singles at the JCC North Y branch. Proceeds of last year's party funded the RSVP program (Relationships Seen through Varied Perspectives), which the JCC has been running for the past five months in conjunction with Aish HaTorah.

Tickets can be purchased from the JCC, 636-1880, ext. 358; Jewish Singles Registry, 398-7068; Metro Toronto Singles, 222-7111; or the Hamilton JCC.

Anyone wishing to presell tickets should contact Zarnett at 636-1880, ext. 358. One complimentary ticket will be issued for every ten tickets sold.

The JCC North Y branch received assistance from the Association of Young Jewish Adults of Canada, the Hamilton JCC, Israel Cancer Research Fund, the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, Metro Toronto Singles and the JCC Bloor Y and Valley branches in planning the Tu b'Av event.

About People

PRIDE OF ISRAEL'S RABBI

Rabbi Aaron Howard Flanzraich is Pride of Israel Synagogue's new rabbi. Born in New York in 1966, he attended the Hebrew Academy of Suffolk County and for high school went to the Torah Academy of New Haven, a preparatory boys yeshivah in Connecticut. Upon graduation, he enrolled at Bar-Ilan University in Israel as well as the University's Institute for Talmudic Studies where he was the only undergraduate to teach an accredited course, entitled Introduction to Judaism. One of the founding members of the Israeli Hockey Federation, he became director of hockey at the Bar Yam Ice Arena during his last year in Israel, 1989.

Returning to America Rabbi Flanzraich continued rabbinic training at the Yeshiva of Far Rockaway, New York, and was ordained in Israel by Yeshiva Shaar Ephraim in Jersualem and the Israeli Chief Rabbinate. During his time in New York, he served as an assistant rabbi at the Sayville Jewish Centre and also assistant regional director of BBYO.

The rabbi recently became engaged to Stacee Sokoloff of Toronto and the wedding is planned for August.

PREMIER OF OSSSA

Michael Rubinoff, a Grade 12 student at Thornlea Secondary School in York Region, has been elected the 18th premier of the Ontario Secondary School Student's Association (OSSSA). This is the largest student organization in Canada. Michael represents Ontario's 800,000 secondary school students including, public, separate and francophone.

President of the Thornlea Student Association Council, Michael has been working actively on behalf of his fellow students at Thornlea and throughout York Region and the province. He was also a recipient of the York Region board's Excellence in Education Award in 1993.

Michael is a former member of BBYO and was a participant on the 1994 March of the Living. He is a member of Adath Israel Congregation.

WELLESLEY HOSPITAL APPOINTMENT

Dr. Bill Seidelman has joined The Wellesley Hospital as medical director of HIV Ambulatory/Primary Care Program. The HIV Program is part of the hospital's expanded Department of Family and Community Medicine.

Dr. Seidelman

A native of Vancouver, Seidelman holds a degree in medicine from the University of British Columbia. He practised in the REACH Clinic, a community health centre in Vancouver affiliated with the Department of Pediatrics at UBC. In 1976 he joined the Department of Family Medicine at McMaster University and the Family Practice Unit of the Hamilton General Hospital Division at Hamilton Civic Hospital.

In 1983 Seidelman was visiting professor of family practice at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev and was scholar-in-residence at the University's Lord Immanual Jakobovitz Centre for Jewish Medical Ethics in 1991. He is an internationally-recognized expert on the subject of the history of medicine in Nazi Germany, its continuing legacy and the ensuing ethical challenges. Seidelman is currently a full professor in the Department of Family and Community Medicine at the University of Toronto.

GRADUATING BIALIK KIDS STAGE CANTATA

Bialik Hebrew Day School's Grade 8 graduating class of 43 students recently presented a musical cantata, "Israel Reflected by its Poetry" at the Leah Posluns Theatre. Four of the grads delivered a farewell to their 10 years at Bialik in the four languages taught at the school, English, French, Hebrew and Yiddish. Pictured is one of the "peace" songs and dances from the performance. [Mollie Rothman Photo]

Rotman gets honor

TORONTO — Merchant banker, oilman and philanthropist Joseph Rotman was recently awarded an honorary doctorate from the University of Toronto.

Rotman, chief executive officer of Clairvest Group Inc. and founder of Tarragon Oil and Gas Ltd., recently endowed the university's Faculty of Management. The faculty's new home on St. George Street, to open next year, will bear the Rotman name.

That name is also attached to the Rotman Research Institute of Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care. The institute, opened in 1989 to study behavioral changes during aging, was proposed and funded in part by Rotman.

His other community commitments include serving as president of the Board of Trustees of the Art Gallery of Ontario, as a director of the Toronto Hospital Foundation and as a member of the National Council of the Canadian Institute of International Affairs. He is past chair of the Canadian Friends of the Israel Museum.

Congress to lobby to change legislation

Responding to arguments that the current practice violates the equality provisions of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, Dubin cited the Supreme Court of Canada decision in the Bill 30 reference. The High Court ruled in that case that the Canadian constitution permits the extension of funding to the higher grades in Catholic schools.

"The constitutionality of the public funding of Roman Catholic separate schools was upheld even though such funding was unavailable to private religious-based independent schools, or to any other private school," Dubin stated. "I see no suggestion in that case that the government of Ontario was under an obligation to fund such schools."

The chief justice also noted as a factor "the additional cost to the public to fund private religious based independent schools." He said that cost could go as high as $340 million per year.

The Appeal Court also turned down a request for school health support services for students with disabilities.

Segal said in addition to considering an option in the courts, Congress will continue lobbying political leaders for a change in legislation. He said with an election coming up, Congress' political liaison committees will meet with candidates to discuss the funding issue.

Echoing those comments, Guldemond said "we've got our campaign strategy far developed to go after politicians during the election." He said the Alliance will also embark on a public education program to garner support for government funding.

But if the comments of Liberal leader Lyn McLeod are any indication, Congress and the Alliance could be in for disappointment should the Grits be elected.

Interviewed by The CJN during a nomination meeting for Wilson Heights MPP Monte Kwinter, McLeod said "funding costs" and "financial constraints" are factors that a future Liberal government will have to contend with.

She said the recommendations in a 1985 report by Bernard Shapiro, which suggested bringing independent schools under the public school board umbrella, is an approach she would favor — subject to the funding constraints. She said the Liberals are philosophically committed to a "single tier" system and she opposed funding independent schools otherwise.

Kwinter said he favored a system in which parents who send their children to independent schools would receive an exemption from paying school taxes.

Okanagan Jews participate in Kelowna Folk Fest

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

KELOWNA, B.C. — Blintzes, cheese cake, bagels and cream cheese were among the favorite foods sold by the Okanagan Jewish Community (OJC) at Kelowna's recent annual Folk Fest.

The OJC was amongst a dozen ethnic communities participating in the event.

In addition to having a food booth, the OJC showcased Israeli dancing on stage. The stage troupe was organized by Karen Stein, while the food booth was organized by Nancy Henry and Kathy Teal.

The on-stage performers included Gloria Golbey, Donna Rubadeau, Paul Henry, Lisa Diamond, Robert Levin, Leah Jewall, Michael Mendelsohn, Steve Finkleman, Leslie Finkleman, Ilana Finkleman, Sigal Stein, Rifka Stein, Sue Chernovsky, Rebekah Wittenberg and Carol Goldsein.

Youth orchestra offers stirring recital

By JACK KOHANE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Nahariya Youth Orchestra, one of the world's most brilliant youth ensembles, performed at a sold-out concert recently at the North York Performing Arts Centre's Recital Hall.

Toronto played host to the launching of the orchestra's cross-North America tour that includes Calgary, New York City, Washington D.C., and a number of major concert venues in the Eastern United States.

Since its establishment in 1973, the Nahariya Youth Orchestra has earned international acclaim under the skillful guidance of its founder and chief conductor, Arie Kfir.

The orchestra toured Europe in 1980 and was awarded third place at an international competition held in Valencia, Spain in 1989.

Of the twelve young Israeli musicians chosen to represent Israel at the Interlocken Music Camp in the United States, five of the students were members of the Nahariya Youth Orchestra.

According to Kfir, dozens of his past proteges have gone on to carve out professional musical careers for themselves.

"These graduates of our program, many of whom are considered to be child prodigies, are now contributing to the arts as music instructors, players and performers with the Boston Pops Orchestra, lecturing and studying at the Juilliard School in New York, and attending the Manhattan School of Music."

Kfir was born in Nahariya in 1951 of parents who immigrated to Israel from Romania. The town of 45,000 is located eight kilometres south of the Lebanon border and has been subjected to frequent katyusha missile attacks over the years.

"I recall the time during the Gulf War," says Kfir. "Because of the threat of SCUD missile attacks from Iraq, we spent weeks of rehearsal times with gas masks always ready."

Today, he is the Principal of the Nahariya Municipal Conservatory of Music, which currently has 400 students and 20 teachers. The Youth Orchestra is considered the jewel in the Conservatory's crown.

The presentation at the Recital Hall was sponsored by the Golden Givers Program of United Jewish Appeal (UJA) and the Israel Government Tourist Office.

Kfir dedicated the performance to the many who have contributed to UJA for 25 years or more.

Wendy Eisen, co-chair of Toronto's 1995 UJA campaign echoed Kfir's thanks: "In 1994, the Jewish agenda is once again being revised. Now, we at home are concerned with ensuring Jewish continuity ... and Israel faces new challenges in its search for a just and lasting peace. We remain certain that [all] our Golden Givers will remain steadfast in their support and committed to the survival of the Jewish people."

Among those honored with Golden Giver Awards were Sadie Miller and Michael Rosenberg.

After Eisen's remarks, the 48-member Nahariya Youth Orchestra rocketed into its stirring recital. Baton slashing the air, Kfir led the skilled 11- to 17-year-old musicians through a medley of marching tunes by John Philip Sousa and a selection of memorable scores by Andrew Lloyd Webber.

The performance was highlighted by remarkable solo performances on clarinet by 15-year-old Assaf Karmi, whose rendition of Freilich stole the show.

"I have been playing the clarinet for six years, and been with the orchestra for five years," Assaf said proudly. "This stop in Toronto is one of the most important in our tour. We have looked forward to visiting this city for a very long time and it is certainly the most pleasant cultural experience we have encountered."

The performance of My Yiddishe Mama was the concert's high point, leaving not a dry eye in the house.

The orchestra closed with songs from Fiddler On The Roof, including If I Were a Rich Man and To Life. The packed house responded with unrestricted clapping and singing and a prolonged, appreciative standing ovation.

Sherman tackles heated subjects

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Are the writings of Philip Roth or Mordecai Richler good or bad for the Jews?

It's a heated subject and one that's relevant to the work of award-winning Jason Sherman, a young Toronto Jewish playwright.

Two of Sherman's four short plays in Stop Slowing Down, recently at the Fringe Festival, raise the question anew of why Jewish content is a hot item on the current theatre scene.

In Confess, an actor (Michael Healey) questions his right to act the part at the Shaw Festival of a Marrano Jew confessing his secret faith to an agent of the Spanish Inquisition. He steps out of the role to tell the audience that on the eve of his own bar mitzvah, he nearly strangled his six-year-old brother to death.

Life and art are too closely linked, he intimates, for him to play the Shaw Festival role. The sketch is weakened by gratuitous references to Christopher Newton, the Shaw's director.

In The Merchant of Showboat, a black woman, a politician (Marium Carvell) crticizes an entrepreneur (Martin Julien) for staging Showboat, and threatens to boycott the production. The promoter is facile and cunning. There is no doubt where the playwright and audience stand in this debate. But in the light of how this explosive issue has wracked the black and Jewish communities here, is a dramatic spinoff valid?

In two other short plays without Jewish themes, Sherman displays the virtuosity and talent which won him a major award for The League of Nathans and an award nomination for Three in the Back, Two in the Head. The power of langugage used by the director (Healey) in Equity Rules to convince the auditioning actress (Melissa Bell) to strip naked if she wants the part, is absolutely frightening, director Ian Prinsloo skilfully bulding an overlay of tension.

In Field a Toronto man (Julien) travels the 401 highway to the street where he and his brothers grew up in Montreal, unable to remember whether it was 311 or 313 Emerson where he lived, and realizing that the vacant field where he captured frogs and grasshoppers is gone forever. His wife's eagerness to capture the "homecoming"on a camcorder only adds to the angst.

In The League of Nathans the motives of a young Canadian Jew making aliyah are suspect, while his friend, who opts to stay in Canada, is characterized in a heroic mould.

In my review of the play, I recalled a comment by Arthur Miller that he never identified a character as a Jew if there was chance it could play into the hands of anti-Semites. Without endorsing this broad concept, I do raise the question of whether playwright Sherman is unwittingly pandering to a negative interest in things Jewish in the alternative theatre scene.

BILL GLADSTONE'S EYE ON ARTS

Welcome to the Summer Literary Column. This week's Eye on Arts is devoted to literature and the printed word.

* * *

Writing Thru Race Conference: Much ink in the Globe & Mail and elsewhere has been devoted to discussing the controversial gathering of non-white members of the Writers Union of Canada, which was held in Vancouver on the Canada Day weekend. Even before the contentious meeting, debate about it almost tore the WUC apart at its annual general meeting in Toronto — until members agreed to disagree until next year.

"The Union has no prejudices against any writer," proclaimed author Pierre Berton, a longtime outspoken foe of racial intolerance of any kind. "Anyone who has written a published book in this country — no matter if his skin is pink or green or yellow — is eligible to join this Union." Despite some heckling, Berton went on to say that the union, of which he is a founding member, cannot officially support "any organization that excludes people from certain things because of the color of their skin."

Writer Roy Miki was chair of the racial minority writers committee at the Writing Thru Race Pre-Conference Event. Miki explains in remarks that were quoted in the July issue of Quill & Quire, Canada's foremost literary journal, that "writers of color" have many common issues to discuss, such as the "tyranny of grammar" and how editors deal with one's mother tongue. "What if there are no white characters in your novel? What are the consequences of these things? You can't get the answers from mainstream white writers," Miki argued.

Perhaps not, but was it really necessary to cause such a stir by depriving whites of the opportunity to attend the discussion? The unfortunate exclusion of anyone based on skin color is an inexcusable form of cultural apartheid. Bravo to Vancouver writer and WUC member Evelyn Lau, who boycotted the Writing Thru Race Conference, explaining in the Globe & Mail (July 9): "I don't want to have opportunities based on my color separating me from the equally struggling white male writer next door."

Summer Reading: E.L. Doctorow's latest novel is called The Waterworks. It's a dark mystery set in New York in the 1870s. The story concerns a newspaper editor's attempt to find his ace freelance scribe, Martin Pemberton, who disappears after seeing his father alive on a trolley months after his supposed funeral. The writing is evocative of Edgar Allan Poe in its dark moodiness, Henry James in its occasional obscurities, Nathaniel Hawthorne in its moral sense, and Charles Dickens in the range of lively, colorful characters that spring forth from the pages. With this book, it's clear that Doctorow, whether intentionally or not, is painting a sweeping historic sketch of New York City with his collective works: consider such wonderful novels as Billy Bathgate, World's Fair, Ragtime and The Book of Daniel. The Waterworks may not be Doctorow's best, but I found it an intriguing page-turner none the less. Random House, $31.

It's hard to put down the pre-eminent American-Jewish author Philip Roth, whose latest offering — Operation Shylock: A Confession (1993) — I finally got around to reading. Until I put it down, that is, after about 100 pages. The story, which reads like a combination of fiction and non-fiction, involves Roth's attempts to track down and put a stop to someone impersonating him, an imposter who gives lectures in Israel to promote a bizarre reverse exodus of Jews from Israel back to the Diaspora. The opening sections are dazzling for inventiveness and sheer fun, but the narrative unfortunately gets bogged down when a woman enters the picture. This is as one might expect from the author of Portnoy's Complaint, The Breast and Goodbye Columbus. To be fair, the first part of the book shows so much promise that I intend to pick it up again the first chance I get. Vintage, $16 (paperback).

Richler's back

Coming In The Fall: Mordecai Richler has a new book coming out in September. This Year in Jerusalem (Knopf Canada, $27.50) is to contain autobiography, history and social commentary. "From the Montreal of his adolescence to his present-day travels in Israel, Richler shares his experiences and thoughts on Zionism, Judaism, and the relationship of Canadians and Americans to Israel," reports Quill & Quire. A chapter entitled I Was a Teenage Zionist appears in the July issue of Saturday Night magazine. It's vintage Richler at his cynical best.

Toronto author Jack Kuper, who wrote the bestselling Child of the Holocaust, has written a sequel. After the Smoke Cleared (Stoddart, $24.95) is due for release in October. In I Remember It Like Now, due for publication in September (Black Moss, $18.95), Jo Atkinson tells the odyssey of Chaim Goldberg, a Polish Jew who left Warsaw when Germany invaded in 1939 and circled the globe before war's end.

Modern Poems On The Bible: An anthology: Edited by David Curzon (Jewish Publication Society, $30 US).

The 170 poems in this excellent and evocative collection all relate in one way or another to personalities and events in the Hebrew scriptures. The pieces are by both Jews and non-Jews and some are translated from Hebrew, Italian, Yiddish, Hungarian and Polish.

Taken together the poets make up a galaxy of eminence. They range from John Hollander, Dan Pagis, Primo Levi, Robert Graves and Nelly Sachs to Czeslaw Milosz, Marianne Moore, Thomas Hardy and Yehudah Amichai.

The editor, an economist by profession, and a sometime poet by inclination, regards these poems as a kind of midrash, in which the poet imaginatively fills in the empty spaces and completes the picture when the biblical narrative or description remains ambigious, terse or elusive. Thus, we can learn why Lot's wife turns back, how Jacob felt upon hearing the reported death of his son, Joseph, the remorse of Delilah after her betrayal of Samson.

Curzon's object is to reach a wide audience with these readily comprehended poems and at the same time enhance recognition of the biblical text. He succeeds in both aims. This is a book to cherish.

I Keep Recalling, by Jacob Glatstein (Ktav Publishing (no price indicated)).

Born in Lublin, Poland, Jacob Glatstein (1896-1971) emigrated to the United States at the age of 18. Over the years he won recognition as one of the most talented and accomplished Yiddish poets of our time.

This bilingual volume, with the Yiddish superbly translated by Barnett Zumoff, brings to readers in both languages Glatstein's Holocaust poems. They are a lament for Jewish suffering and to what was lost in Eastern Europe, and an uncompromising challenge to the implacable God of Israel.

Many of the poems excoriate the Germans. "Only you alone, with the help of your philosophers,/ Can explain the hellishness of your bestial punishments,/ Can reveal the inherited rot/ Of murder in your bones."

The poet is certain that one day God will punish "Those that have laid waste Your house,/ Turned Your silent sheep into smoke,/ And made pigsties of Your synagogues/ Will die a hundred times/ Before Your revenge,/ The timeless, patient revenge,/ Grows and blossoms."

In the poem entitled I Keep Recalling, Glatstein enumerates the ordinary, daily activities and concerns of his native village, the members of his family, the strong collective devotion to Jewish learning and culture. "I remember how the whole dear living Bible/ Became a moving aquarium/ With such many-splendored, flickering iridecence/ That the Bible sparkled/ And became surrounded/ With precious gems,/ Ringed with the clarity of Rashi's commentary,/ Till it became the interpreted/ And lucidly-sung history of my own people."

This treasure trove of imagery and creative imagination enkindles our emotions and probes the depths of our humanity.

Old Roots New Trees, by Judah Denburg (Mosaic Press (no price indicated)).

This paperbound volume, subtitled A Personal Midrash, is the work of a member of the medical faculty at MacMaster University, Hamilton, where he is director of immunology and allergy. He is a graduate of Yeshiva University, fluent in Hebrew and conversant with traditional and secular Jewish literature.

His poems are rich in imagery and metaphor and explore biblical themes, the relationship between the generations, the world of nature, memories of the Jewish past, and the replenishment power of love.

In Golden Songbirds the poetry recalls the Israelites wandering in the wilderness, "when the honeydew of heaven/ was given to refresh our palates/ craving the taste of flesh in goshen/ we begged for water unrepentant,/ staring at mirage and anger—/ it was then glory struck us,/ we left the feast to listen/ to the golden songbirds of spring/ somewhere in sinai hidden,/ we heard your voice again/ promising eternal sustenance—/ and now where is that song/ lost, ineffable/ like dream flown?"

In Song the poet declares, "I want to sing you a song,/ deep and clear/ icy pools of melody/ heart evanescent/ in a dream./ I want to play with an image/ like a sculptor in prayer,/ until it is molded / into life/ impossible to hold/ I shall use my words carefully/ join letters/ create numbers/ to encode a message/ or symbol of love/ cryptic, understood."

These lovingly wrought pieces bear rereading for proper appreciation of nuance and meaning. The book is available in Toronto Jewish bookstores.

Author's struggle with cancer told with verve and humor

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

Fanny Gaynes

TORONTO — How do you not judge a book by its cover when that book is How Am I Gonna Find A Man If I'm Dead?

The title alone amply hints at the frankness and naughty humor to be found within Fanny Gaynes' account of her struggle with breast cancer. The book itself reads like a heart-to-heart with a friend you've known since high school.

A photo of Gaynes on the dust jacket shows a woman with masses of shoulder-length curls and a broad smile made complete by under-eye laugh lines.

An award-winning ad copy writer who grew up near Detroit, Gaynes changed her name to Fanny at the age of 42 in an effort to prolong her life. (According to Jewish belief, changing the name of a seriously ill person is a way to fool the Angel of Death.)

Gaynes' elderly great-great-aunt had changed her own name to Chaya Bella at the same age after being told she had six months to live.

Gaynes used meditation to help her "see" her new name. "Fanny!" she wrote. "It surprised me as much as it did everyone else."

Although Gaynes died last year at the age of 47, 12 years after being diagnosed with breast cancer, she notes in the introduction to her book that her story is "much less about dying than it is about coming alive.

"If anything in my story helps one person..., I'll know why it is — besides sunsets and shopping and sex — that I lived to tell it," she declares.

"Fanny Gaynes tells her story with such verve and humor that the reader is left rooting for her and feeling better prepared to deal with his or her own problems. A touching and inspiring book," reads the dust jacket endorsement by Rabbi Harold Kushner, author of When Bad Things Happen to Good People.

Gaynes' problems included a volatile marriage which ended shortly after her diagnosis. Her subsequent romantic and sexual escapades add spice and poignancy to a story shaped in large part by her medical condition and treatments.

Shortly after beginning a regimen of chemotherapy, Gaynes was invited on a blind date by "the kind of guy it takes me ten years to find."

When she accepted on condition the date be "right away," he asked why. "I couldn't tell him, 'Because my hair is scheduled to fall out in two days and I want to have just one last normal unfettered date with someone who has no idea I have cancer, before I leave for the planet Ming.' So I said, 'Because my sister's coming to town...and after that I might be traveling.' Not entirely a lie," she writes.

From the outset, Gaynes made an effort to understand and have a say in her medical treatment. "The second doctor at least asked the right questions," she says about an oncologist to whom she didn't return. "Trouble was, he asked the wrong party — 'So when did we discover the lump, Richard?' "

Despite chemotherapy, two mastectomies and an experimental bone-marrow transplant, all of which played a part in her battle, Gaynes retained a relish for making the most of each day. Her very personal take on life makes her book, published by Morgin Press Inc., a worthwhile read.

Israel visit inspired play

By GERRY MORRIS
Special to The CJN

NEW YORK — The play Milk & Honey first opened in 1961.

It heralded the Broadway debut of composer-lyricist Jerry Herman (Mame, Dear World, Mack & Mabel, La Cage Aux Folles).

The original version was inspired by Herman's long visit to Israel where he meshed the sounds and colors of this young nation into a joyfully melodious score. A spirit of youthful sponaneity and adventure reflected a more simple time in the history of the American musical theatre.

The original version was a big winner. It starred the imcomparable Molly Picon, Mimi Benzell and Robert Weede, and featured a large chorus, a tuneful score and imaginative choreography.

Both Herman and the State of Israel were young, and intensely alive.

A scaled-down revival can now be seen on stage at off-Broadway's American Jewish Theatre, and in some ways this wistfully amusing story surpasses the original production.

The story concerns a bus load of Jewish-American widows visiting Israel, hoping to catch husbands along with the sights. The dramatic expression stems from four story lines cleverly incorporated into the altered text that now focuses more fully on problems of loneliness, true love and emigration.

The production is imaginatively directed by Richard Sabellico, and he is blessed with some strong actor-singers. Ron Holgate acquits himself handsomely with a commanding voice, first-rate acting.

Chevi Colton is a standout among the widows and along with Jeanne Lehman is most graceful and gracious. Avi Hoffman, Lori Wilner, Katy Selverstone and James Barbour are solid as the various troubled lovers.

Appearing for an indefinite run at the American Jewish Theatre, 307 West 26th Street, New York.

Bon Echo provincial park offers mystical ties to the past

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

What natural feature gives Bon Echo provincial park, in northeastern Ontario, a special reputation among campers? We arrived here late one June afternoon without knowing the answer — but we soon found out.

After pitching our tent, we set off on a hike through the tangled forest, threading through stands of birches and pines along a pine-needle path. Then we saw something shining through the trees ahead.

It was of great size and luminescence, and seemed to grow brighter as we approached. Breaking through the trees, we came to the water's edge and confronted Bon Echo's majestic secret.

We stood before a large, peaceful body of water — Lake Mazinaw — and before the enormous rock that juts out of the lake at a sheer angle, towering 100 meters. Because the rock is directly illuminated by the afternoon sun, its pink, gray, ochre and quartz tones seemed to sparkle with light, reflecting as pastels in the shimmering water.

Mazinaw Rock has been called "Canada's Gibraltar." It possesses all the mystical power of the desert buttes of the American southwest or Ayers Rock in Australia. In ancient days, aboriginals painted an array of some 135 red-ochre pictographs on the rockface.

In awe of the cliff, we followed the coastline and soon came to a narrow beach, a lagoon, motorboat and ferry docks, and a wide sandy beach. The air was filled with the whoops and cries of swimmers, castle-builders, beachcombers. After a refreshing swim, we took the ferry across the lagoon, and climbed a cast-iron staircase of 180 steps to the lookout on the rock's summit.

We overlooked a panoramic vista of forest. The sun was nearing the western horizon and the lake reflected the pale gold of the sky. Because of the extreme declension of the sun, each pine ridge was articulated from its neighbour; we could easily adduce where camp was by the blue haze of smoke.

According to legend, a horde of Indian gold and silver is hidden atop Mazinaw Rock. Another legend tells of fierce battles fought atop this rock by rival bands of Algonquin and Iroquois, with slaughtered Iroquois combatants falling dramatically to their deaths.

Lake Mazinaw has many bays, inlets, fingers and islands to challenge canoeists. After breakfast on our first morning, we rented a canoe at Bon Echo Villa, a cluster of stores outside the park. Then we paddled across the lake at its widest, scouting in vain for a suitable landing site on the opposite, jagged shore.

Aurora dances in starry sky

One spot seemed safe enough, but subsequently proved so slippery and treacherous that we were forced to paddle a hasty retreat. Finally, landing upon a small rock bereft of vegetation, we took a refreshing swim, then rejoined the canoe, covering ourselves with towels like desert wanderers to escape the hot sun.

Recrossing the lake, we returned to the great cliff. Above us, straight from the pages of Mark Twain, groups of rock-climbers were diving into the water from impressive heights. Manoeuvring around other canoes, we passed some Indian pictographs, painted only a foot or two above the water-line.

We also came upon an enormous rockface inscribed with a remarkable inscription, dedicated to the American poet Walt Whitman: "My foothold is tenon'd and mortised in granite; I laugh at what you call dissolution, and I know the amplitude of time."

Suffragist and spiritualist Flora MacDonald Denison, who lived in Bon Echo, commissioned this carving on the centenary of the poet's birth in 1919. Denison ran the Bon Echo Inn, which at its zenith between 1910 and 1920 attracted rich and famous visitors from Canada, the United States and Europe.

Relaxing along a small public beach, we noticed dark clouds sailing over the pine ridge and set off for the rental establishment three miles away. The air darkened and quivered but the storm held off until the white dot along the water, a marker of our destination, grew into a full-sized Esso sign.

That night, after the storm had passed, the aurora borealis danced in a sky full of stars, and we went walking with a flashlight. We had not gone too far beyond the campground when we felt the imaginary eyes of wolves and bears upon us, and thought it prudent to return to the safety of our comforting cluster of humanity.

Disney Sparks Civil War: How would Jews like it if the Holocaust Museum had been built by a private commercial organization known for its appealing showbusiness productions that are often whitewashed to be palatable to family audiences?

The Walt Disney Corp. plans to build Disney's America, a $650-million Civil War theme park outside Washington. The project would include a Norman Rockwell-style family farm and an unspecified presentation on slavery. Some African-Americans are understandably concerned that Disney can't handle serious and dark social issues that don't necessarily have happy endings.

Disney chair Michael Eisner reponds that critics are unfairly prejudging the company's plans. Unless Congress gets involved, Disney seems ready to go ahead with the development; municipal officials seem eager for the jobs and other benefits it will generate. If it succeeds, Disney's America could make up for the EuroDisney debacle. The Disney theme park outside Paris has performed poorly since opening several years ago.

Hot Spot for Tourism: Why does Branson, Missouri, a town with only 3,743 permanent residents, receive more than six million visitors each season? Nestled in the rolling Ozark hills, Branson has become a musical magnet with all the draw of Nashville. Andy Williams, Tony Orlando, Bobby Vinton, Moe Bandy, Roy Clark and the Osmond Brothers are some of the stars who have opened multi-million dollar showcases here. Branson boasts more than 30 nightclubs and theatres in which performers who once toured now perform, night after night, and let their publics come to them.

Store offers free consulting service to plus-size women

By MARLA KAY
Special to The CJN

Jo-Anne Walter was tired of shopping for "over-sized" or "plus-size" clothing in small areas of large department stores, or going to specialty shops that all carried the same styles.

For the past two years she has owned an exclusive and wonderfully stocked boutique specializing in women's fashions size 14 to 24 called The Answer Salon, at 3200 Yonge St., Toronto.

"I want to offer the plus size woman the opportunity to look fashionable at affordable prices," states Walter. "We carry different stylings that suit any and all occasions including dressy, casual and business."

Walter constantly attends shows and travels to the United States on buying trips to add new lines to The Answer Salon collections."

"Andrea Jovine," says Walter, "is a very fashion-forward designer when it comes to plus size apparel. She incorporates more knits and fewer prints in her creations. She emphasizes solids with attractive detailing. Danskin has just introduced an exciting plus-line of aerobic wear that is brand new to Canada and they will also be generating a line of casual wear in the fall. Our European collections include HMC and Mamut from Germany."

What's new for summer at The Answer Salon?

"We're showing a lot of natural fibres," says Walter. "Silks, cottons and linens are the big favorites in neutrals, blacks and navy. Palazzo pants and pattern on pattern dressing are providing our plus size clinetelle with a fluid look that is both elegant and flattering."

One of the unique services that The Answer Salon provides for customers is a free consultation with a professional image consultant, Lina Addesi of Essence of Style. Addesi periodically provides consultations in the boutique.

"Our goals at Essence of Style," says Addesi, "are to help the clients project their desired images, one that they feel comfortable with. We provide them with a competitive edge through the image that they portray. We ensure that the client's choice of clothing for all occasions is made easier and worry free and we reduce the client's wardrobe expenditures by reducing unnecessary purchases.

"Society's heightened emphasis on image has created the need for professional image guidance for all members within the business or social community. The clothes you wear not only make a statement about yourself but can contribute to your career advancements by creating a positive image. It is important that the image you project remains consistant and true to your personality and your aspirations."

Walter's customer's have shown their appreciation for this and other personalized services that The Answer Salon provides by their frequent and repeated visits to the store.

KISS flaky lips goodbye

Suffering from dry flaky lips? Now, thanks to COLOURINGS Make-up by The Body Shop, you can have smooth, luscious lips with a unique and new product called Lipscuff. COLOURINGS Lipscuff looks like a textured lipstick and is designed to gently exfoliate your lips so that they'll look and feel great immediately. And like all Body Shop products, COLOURINGS Lipscuff is packed with natural ingredients and is not tested on animals.

"Lipscuff is a natural exfoliator and moisturizer that leaves your lips feeling simply sensational," says Karen Munro, COLOURINGS manager for The Body Shop Canada. "It's the perfect pre-lipstick scrub and a must-have for your make-up bag."

New COLOURINGS Lipscuff contains a unique blend of natural ingredients, including blue corn and walnut shell powder to exfoliate, a pineapple fruit acid to gently dissolve dead skin cells and rejuvenate the skin, and refreshing peppermint oil.

Footcare tips from Scholl

To help create a healthy regime not only for summer but also throughout the year, the experts at Scholl have the following suggestions:

- Clean feet daily with soap, scrubbing lightly in and around toenails and between toes. Rubbing in one direction only, use a pumice stone or callous file on thick, dry, flaky skin on heels and soles. Dry feet thoroughly, especially between toes where trapped moisture encourages bacteria growth.
- A liberal dusting of foot powder keeps moisture at bay and cools hot, tender feet.
- Apply a daily foot moisturizing cream to keep skin soft and supple and to condition dry, cracked skin.
- Trim toenails after showering when they are softest. Clip straight across with a toenail clipper to prevent ingrown toenails. Do not round off corners. Trim slightly longer than tip of the toe.
- Treat your feet to warm footbaths with soothing oils. Avoid soaking feet in salt-based solutions since they can have a drying effect on skin.
- Put your feet and legs up whenever possible. Elevating them higher than heart level improves circulation.
- Massage feet regularly to relieve tension and improve circulation. Using a refreshing moisturizing cream, begin kneading at the ball of the foot and work along the sole up to the heel. Gently push each toe back and forth to relax tired, tense muscles.
- Keep feet healthy and fit by exercising them. Walk whenever possible, keeping feet parallel to each other and pointed straight ahead. Tone and strengthen muscles by performing simple foot exercises such as toe flexes, trying to pick up a pencil or towel with your toes.

Family farm a beehive of activity

By STEPHANIE CHAPMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "Farming is the only industry that I know of where the farmer is expected to take another job — work off the farm — in order to support it," says Bill Redelmeier, owner of Southbrook Farms, one of Ontario's largest roadside markets and pick-your-own produce farms.

And he should know.

In 1939 Willy Redelmeier, Bill's grandfather, emigrated from Holland to Canada. A year later, the family, including Bill's father and uncle, founded Don Head Farms (later changed to Southbrook), and the clan used the nearly 1,000-acre setting as a summer home. At the time, Major Mackenzie Drive was nothing but a dirt road and Maple 55 was the telephone exchange.

From the 1940s through to the 1970s, Don Head Farms had one of North America's top Aberdeen Angus beef cattle herds and Southdown sheep flocks; it was also the site of Canada's largest Jersey dairy herds.

Given the size of the operation and the length of time the farm was in business, it was surprising to learn that Don Head Farms never made any money.

Bill explains that the pride and enjoyment the family derived from the day-to-day operations of the farm was payment enough.

However, he candidly points out that he, as the third generation, was a source of conflict for the family. Bill said he didn't want to follow in his family's footsteps. "I wanted it [the farm] to be a money-making success."

The solution was to split the farm in half and in 1983, Southbrook was born.

Sitting in one of the 100-year-old barns that has been renovated into part of the winery founded in 1991, Bill clearly shows his pride in his accomplishments.

He talks about changes in the farming industry. When he graduated from the University of Guelph in 1979, his year had the highest percentage of graduates who were going back into farming. Today, Bill only knows of four or five who are still in the business.

He summed up the industry's woes when he said, "It's called a cash crop because as soon as you plant it, it begins costing you money."

From the beginning, Bill, along with his wife Marilyn and farm manager Derek Barnett, knew if they were to survive and succeed, a market niche would have to be determined. Today, one of their claims to fame is the fact that Southbrook offers only Ontario produce.

It's also a place where city folk can go to participate in "the farming experience."

Southbrook draws people for different reasons. During the week, the farm attracts customers who have come to look at the market as a stop on their weekly shopping tour. Saturday, although the numbers are smaller than Sunday, customers still spend money.

On Sunday, the farm's busiest day, families look to Southbrook for entertainment.

Bill says that they come to look at the beehives, pick the fruit-of-the-week, take a wagon ride or visit Max the bull.

Throughout the season, the Redelmeiers offer a variety of entertainment — be it the Strawberry Festival (held at the end of June) or the Third Anniversary Celebration (July 30 - August 1) that will feature winery tours, music, a barbecue and more. Part of the proceeds are donated to Toronto's Sick Children's Hospital.

Southbrook wines and baked goods are not listed with the Kashruth Council, but many of the ready-made sauces, honey, jams and herbal combinations sold in their retail store are kosher under rabbinic supervision.

Among the fresh fruits and vegetables grown on the farm are strawberries, raspberries, peas, beans, currants, cucumbers, corn, tomatoes, peppers and squash. Pumpkins are Southbrook's biggest draw and the last Sunday before Hallowe'en is the farm's busiest day of the year. Bill attributes this to the fact that Hallowe'en is what he considers "the only non-religious, non-negative holiday."

The winery was launched in 1991. A year prior to the opening, Ian Hanna, president of John Hanna & Sons international wine importers, joined the team. In May 1992, the winery opened to the public with 4,000 cases of wine produced in 1991; in 1992, production was up to 5,000 cases.

In its first year, Southbrook won 10 medals, including two Intervin (New York) and three at England's Wine challenge. Southbrook's Framboise and Dry Reisling are among the official wines served at Canadian embassies around the world.

Bill says the move to incorporate wines into the business was prompted by the fact that good food deserves good wine.

Another feather in Southbrook's cap is that it has been chosen by Knives & Forks, the alliance of organic food advocates as the site for the annual Feast of Fields, to be held Sept. 11.

Bill describes the event as "a mile-long edible path." Participants are given a plate and a glass and are let loose to sample 50 chefs' gourmet dishes, accompanied, of course, by wine. Unfortunately, this event is not kosher.

Bill and Marilyn have created a daytime destination for the whole family. In recognition of Southbrook's progressive philosophy, Bill was elected a director of the York region of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture in 1988.

In 1992, he was elected president of the Ontario Farm Fresh Marketing Association, a group of 150 equally-progressive farm markets located across Ontario.

In the past, Bill has established the Farmer's market at Nathan Philips Square, held on Wednesday, and most recently, he has founded a similar market at Mel Lastman Square, held every Thursday.

Looking around the 285-acre farm, Bill admits that his lifestyle was altered considerably when the first child of the fourth generation came on the scene. His son Andrew was born, fittingly enough, on Hallowe'en day two and a half years ago. With another child on the way, it's sure to change again.

"It's fun," Bill say, "but then again, if it wasn't we wouldn't be where we are today."

L'Oreal donates $1 million to fund campaign in Israel

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — L'Oreal, the world's largest cosmetics company, will donate $1 million (U.S.) to support a new campaign in Israel to combat traffic accidents.

The goal of the campaign is to change the behavior of both Israeli drivers and pedestrians, according to Paris-based L'Oreal executives.

L'Oreal's donation comes against the backdrop of its often rocky relationship with Israel.

Twice in the last three years, the French cosmetics giant has been accused of complying with the Arab economic boycott of Israel.

Civil suits against the company have been filed in the United States and France by two French brothers, Jean and David Frydman.

The suits allege that L'Oreal bribed Syrian authorities to get off their blacklist after the company's chairman, Bernard Dalle, entered into a business arrangement with Jean Frydman, who also holds Israeli citizenship. Frydman had been a L'Oreal director in France.

There have been reports that L'Oreal initiated discussions with Israeli officials last year to help smooth over relations between the company and the Jewish state.

In May of this year, L'Oreal announced that it had made a $7 million investment in Israel, acquiring 30 per cent of Interbeauty, Israel's principal distributor of L'Oreal cosmetics.

Smooth relations

In an attempt to end the unprecedented carnage on Israel's roads and highways, the L'Oreal campaign's organizers have enlisted the aid of dozens of children, who will appear in advertisements geared toward both adults and children.

Last year, more than 500 Israelis died in road accidents, one-third of them pedestrians.

Since the founding of the state, almost 20,000 Israelis have been killed on the roads — about the same number that have died in wars and terrorist attacks.

The ad campaign will focus on the behavior patterns of children and youth as pedestrians and future drivers. The children in the ads will also call their parents' attention to the importance of safe driving.

At a news conference this week announcing the L'Oreal donation, Knesset member Avraham Burg of Labor, chairman of the Knesset Education Committee, said research shows that changing the driving habits of many Israelis requires real behavior modification.

"The support we are getting from L'Oreal and a host of Israeli public figures is going to allow us to get the safe-driving message out in a new and powerful way," Burg said.

Canada-Israel free trade pact talks proceed

JERUSALEM — There has been considerable progress in negotiations over the Free Trade Agreement, Canadian Ambassador Norman Spector said this month at the Israel-Canada Chamber of Commerce annual general meeting.

Spector emphasized the important developments in trade relations between Israel and Canada, adding that there are signs of a breakthrough in defense trading. Spector said Canada and Israel have already signed a $6 million research and development agreement.

Industry and Trade Minister Micha Harish said there is a huge potential for mutual trade between Israel and Canada.

He emphasized the dramatic developments in allocation of land for new industries due to the increasing demand for investments, especially by foreigners.

The minister said the NIS 170 million originally earmarked for the purpose of allocating land has already been spent, and another NIS 170 million was recently approved for further development in the field.

David Reichman, chair of Darcom, emphasized the possibilities for success in developing new businesses in Israel, citing himself as an example.

At the annual meeting, the chamber's president, Yehuda Levy, who is also president and publisher of the Jerusalem Post, completed his term. A new president will be elected in the near future.

BIZ BRIEFS

Stock Market Losses

JERUSALEM — Shares traded on the Israeli stock market have lost some $20 billion since the beginning of 1994, with losses particularly heavy during the past couple of months.

In an interview with the Israeli daily Ha'aretz, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin said the market did not reflect the state of the economy which, he said, was growing by six and seven per cent annually.

Rabin said that no one could satisfactorily explain why the stock market was performing so poorly, but there have been repeated statements in the Israeli media by financial experts that the stocks were overvalued.

In an editorial, Ha'aretz echoed the advice of economic experts: Investors who have the patience and the means to wait out the current downturn will avoid taking losses.

The present low, the newspaper pointed out, is a mirror image of an exaggerated high last year, which the Governor of the Bank of Israel, Jacob Frenkel, described as "a financial bubble."

BB Launches Investment Plan

JERUSALEM — B'nai Brith International recently launched an Israel investment program which the group said symbolizes the changing political climate in the Middle East and the changing relationship between Diaspora Jewry and Israel.

B'nai Brith has helped arrange for a new mutual fund package slated to be available to U.S. investors in about two months.

One of the nine funds in the package will be the Israel Opportunities Fund Inc., an open-ended investment company aimed at long-term capital appreciation by investment in securities on the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange (TASE).

For many years the thrust of the American Jewish relationship to Israel has been philanthropy, Kent Schiner, international president of B'nai Brith said as he unveiled the plan.

While B'nai Brith still supports philanthropy, the new investment program reflects an emphasis on partnership and investment, Schiner said.

It offers "direct involvement and investment in Israel's economic development," he said.

Indeed, the program comes amid calls by some Israeli leaders for a realignment of the Israel-Diaspora relationship based on partnership.

The inauguration of the fund's sales is planned for the international conference of B'nai Brith in Chicago in August.

$3 Million For Health Research

TORONTO — Women's College Hospital and the University of Toronto recently announced that $2 million in donations have enabled the two institutions to establish a joint chair in breast cancer research and an additional $1 million grant will contribute to funding a joint chair in women's health research.

The donations have been financed by major gifts to the Hospital with $1 million of the $2 million necessary to finance the chair in women's health research coming from the Atkinson Charitable Foundation.

Smoke-Free Eating

NORTH YORK — The demand for smoke-free dining has prompted the North York Public Health Department to compile a directory of 90 North York restaurants and cafeterias who have voluntarily gone smoke-free.

The directory is the first of its kind in Canada to offer consumers a comprehensive list of where to find smoke-free dining with in a city's borders.

The directory is free to all who call 395-7602. They are also available at North York City Hall, North York Parks & Recreation facilities and North York libraries.

Chinese CPA Firm Admitted

TORONTO — Horwath International (HI), a leading international network of accounting and management consultant firms has admitted the Chinese CPA firm Zhonghua Shenzhen as a member of its international organization.

The move, endorsed by the Chinese Ministry of Finance, represents a departure from the previous practice of international accounting firms establishing joint ventures with Chinese CPA firms.

Groups hail call to end Arab boycott

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — Jewish groups are hailing the call by the world's major industrial powers to end the Arab economic boycott of Israel.

The Group of Seven, meeting in Naples earlier this month, issued a communique that made two references to ending the boycott.

In one instance, the call to end the boycott came at the end of a paragraph that said "economic development is essential to underpin the peace process" and that referred to financial and technical assistance to the nascent Palestinian Authority operating in Gaza and Jericho.

The G-7 nations, which include Canada, also "called upon the League of Arab States to end their boycott of Israel" in a reference that also urged a "comprehensive settlement of the Arab-Israeli dispute and wider process of peace."

Praising the communique, Abraham Foxman, national director of the U.S.-based Anti-Defamation League, said in a statement: "We hail the G-7 statement for its clear and unequivocal call for an end to the boycott, marking the first time the G-7 has urged its termination without linkage to other issues."

In the past, the G-7 statements have linked the termination of the Arab boycott of Israel with Israel's halting of settlements in the territories, according to Stacy Burdett, assistant director of the ADL's Washington office.

She said the Jewish community and pro-Israel groups have consistently pushed to have the boycott "delinked from the peace process" and viewed instead as an economic issue that hurts the G-7 nations.

Martin Raffel, associate executive vice chairman of the National Jewish Community Relations Advisory Council, also called the statement "an improvement from last year."

'Economic terrorism'

However, he said that given the context and brevity of the references, the G-7 call could be seen "as still linked to the peace process."

Raffel also said the G-7 did not go far enough in denouncing the secondary and tertiary boycotts, which blacklist companies that do business with Israel.

Raffel said that the G-7 "should embrace the U.S. position and insist on a total end to the boycott" including the second and tertiary boycotts, which has "never been achieved."

According to Burdett, the termination of the boycott will be difficult to achieve if other countries do not pass and enforce strong anti-boycott legislation similar to that which exists in the United States.

U.S. Rep. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), chairman of the Congressional Task Force to End the Arab Boycott, also welcomed the G-7 statement.

"The G-7 statement demonstrates that the major trading nations will not tolerate this odious form of economic terrorism," he said in a statement.

In a July 6 letter to U.S. Trade Representative Mickey Kantor, Schumer, along with 72 members of the House of Representatives, had written that "an important way for the United States to take the lead in working to end the Arab boycott is to press for the G-7 nations to issue a stronger statement than last year calling for unequivocal opposition to the Arab boycott."

In the letter, Schumer and his co-signers also voiced their concerns about the Arab League's lack of action to end the boycott. The letter noted that a recent Commerce Department report showed that boycott-related activity is continuing at approximately the same rate as last year.

Mirvish's retailing gold mine is based on innovative ideas

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — He did it his way. And he made a bundle.

In an interview with The CJN, Ed Mirvish said he bucked retail trends back in 1948 when he founded Honest Eds, the bargain emporium on Bloor Street.

At that time most retailers were offering customers services like credit, exchanges, and refunds.

But not Mirvish. He didn't even hire sales clerks. He said he skimped on overhead to keep his prices down, establishing the first bargain department store in North America.

It was a gold mine. Within five years of opening its doors the store's annual sales reached $2 million; by 1960, it was $12 million. Last year Honest Eds grossed $65 million.

Mirvish's innovative ideas on advertising and publicity — his corny ads and wacky promotions — attracted media attention. Honest Eds gained notoriety and Mirvish became a local legend.

Mirvish has been making headlines for almost 50 years. And he's making news again this week. On July 24 he'll be hosting a party to celebrate his 80th birthday.

Everyone's invited. There'll be food, prizes and entertainment for the public outside Honest Eds from 11 a.m. to 8 p.m.

The birthday party, an annual tradition since Mirvish turned 75, usually attracts 25,000 people. Even if he gets a good deal on the food and prizes, Mirvish will still be shelling out big bucks for this event.

Not many retailers would go to such lengths for their customers. But Mirvish is not like any other retailer and Honest Eds is not like any other store. And that's just the way Mirvish wants it.

He said many people approached him about turning the operation into a discount chain store. But he said he never wanted to expand because chain stores lack character. "When you've seen one chain store you've seen them all."

Mirvish said he also stayed small — he owns all his companies — because expansion would have meant bringing in shareholders and he never wanted to be accountable to outsiders.

Mirvish said that without shareholders and partners he had more opportunity to be creative. "I'm not as inhibited . . . I can say whatever I want and I can still go back to work."

As a promoter he never lacked inhibition. He's always had a flair for entertaining people, said his childhood friend and right-hand man, Yale Simpson. "Everything he does is show business. Flamboyant is the word for him. He's always been that way."

Mirvish's flamboyance and business acumen turned out to be a winning combination. In his autobiography, How to build an Empire on an Orange Crate, Mirvish said his zany promotions — like the 72-hour dance marathon, the triplets fashion show and the pink elephant sale with a live elephant painted pink — drew crowds and free publicity. "Anything that's ridiculous I'm attracted to," Mirvish said.

Celebrates 80th birthday

He also got a lot of mileage out of his advertising. In his autobiography, he said the corny slogans or — "Ed-Lines" as they've come to be called — were idiotic, but they were eye-catching and gave the store character.

Slogans like "Honest Ed's a slob he's dropping prices everywhere" or "Honest Ed ain't upper crust, but his bargains will save you dough" are plastered all over the store, inside and out. The "Ed-Lines" still add to the store's panache, but today they sound dated and quaint.

Mirvish called the slogans homey, which is the atmosphere he said he tried to create in the store. The display tables are deliberately piled with merchandise so customers can pick through it, he said.

Many people feel comfortable because the store is self service, said Russell Lazar, the general manager of Honest Eds. "People have the freedom to do what they want . . . They're not afraid to touch things."

The store employs four full-time sign painters because the display signs are all hand-painted. Lazar said these signs fit in better with the store's image.

"The machine-made signs have a sterile look," he said.

A large sign with bold red letters, hanging outside the store, reads, "There's no place like this anywhere." And that's probably true.

Haimishness and schlock

The unusual ambience, a blend of haimishness and schlock — with flashing lights, crooked floors, narrow staircases, scattered clothes and corny slogans, along with the morning line-ups for the door-crashers, and the ethnic mix of staff and customers give Honest Eds its peculiar charm.

But will the charm and the bargains be enough ammunition for the store to ward off competition from Wal-Mart Lazar said many people have asked him about the possible impact of the U.S. retail giant on Honest Eds. "People were asking us those same questions in the 60s when Towers, Woolco and K-Mart came along," he said.

"I have a healthy respect for competition. But there are no miracles in retail," Mirvish said, in response to a comment about Wal-Mart's reputation for low prices and good service.

There is always a cost to providing service in retail and it's usually incorporated into the price of the merchandise, he said. "You can't be all things to all people."

Like Honest Eds. It's not like any other bargain store, because it's more than just a place to buy cheap goods.

Honest Eds offers a unique shopping experience. And it's summed up best by the message on its sales slips, "Wasn't that FUN!?"

This week The CJN features . . . Yitz's Delicatessen

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN

TORONTO — Ask Yitz Penciner the secret behind the success of Yitz's Delicatessen and he does not know where to begin.

Penciner, better known to all his customers as Mr. Yitz, has owned the deli at 346 Eglinton Ave. W. since 1972 and he has no foreseeable plans of expanding. "It's important to concentrate on one location so I can spend all my time at the restaurant and supervise everything that is going on. When food goes out, I want to know it's fresh, cooked to specifications and well-presented. That is one of the secrets of a successful restaurant."

A second secret, although when word gets out it will no longer be a secret, is that everything from the meat to the salads to the baked goods is prepared right at the deli.

"By pickling our own meat and baking our own breads and cakes, we have full control over the tastes so we can be proud of what we serve," says Mr. Yitz.

He knows that to keep customers happy, it is important for restaurant owners to keep pace with the times.

"People are now looking for healthy alternatives when they dine out," he says, "so we've added more choice to our menu. We have lots of salads with calorie reduced dressings and we bake such things as nine-grain bread. What is important to remember, however, is that we've remained a delicatessen rather than branching out into a general restaurant. When people come to us, they know they're getting traditional deli fare."

Mr. Yitz's great food is not restricted to his restaurant. Professional staff is always on hand to help cater a party for any number of people from an intimate dinner to a large gathering.

Although Yitz's Delicatessen is not supervised under the Kashruth Council of Toronto, many customers cater their Passover seders and Rosh Hashanah meals. Food is delivered in foil containers with complete heating instructions, so all hosts have to do is pop them in the oven and enjoy. If customers want, Yitz's can arrange for serving staff, bartenders and all rentals. "You can leave everything up to us," says Mr. Yitz.

Mr. Yitz, who has been in the food business for most of his life and has been everything from bus boy to owner says that he still enjoys coming to work every day. "I like to see people, I like to feed people and I like to see them happy. What better business to be in?"

He says that Yitz's Delicatessen is definitely a family restaurant — family oriented as well as owned by Mr. Yitz and his wife, Mrs. Yitz.

"We try to keep the atmosphere light, lively and casual and as a result, a lot of our clientele is made up of families who come back again and again. We greet our regulars by name and know their favorite foods. People often come in and ask us what they should order. Someone is always here with a friendly face and a friendly word."

Firm researches Arab markets and economic trends

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

TEL AVIV — Interested in selling skis to the Saudi royal family? Or supplying medical equipment to war-torn Yemen? Or maybe building roads in the Gaza Strip?

For anyone thinking about doing business in the Arab world, there is a company that provides valuable information, contacts and tips. Its location? Not Amman or Cairo, not Riyadh or Casablanca, but a small office in the centre of Tel Aviv.

Here an ex-Mossad agent and a professor of Middle East studies have pooled their talents — and contacts — to establish Info-Prod Research (Middle East) Ltd., specializing in business research, analysis and consultancy for Arab markets.

While other firms provide information on general economic trends in the Middle East, Info-Prod is distinguished by its nuts-and-bolts approach to business.

"Do you want to sell ladies' shoes in Amman? We can tell you who to call," says Dr. Gil Feiler, the 34-year-old academic-turned-businessman who runs the company together with industrialist and former Mossad agent Moshe Wertheim.

Feiler switches on the desktop computer which stores the company's goldmine of information.

"Let's say you want to sell medical equipment in the Gulf," he says, scanning the computer directory. He stops at the appropriate heading, accesses the file and reveals the information on the computer screen: "Saudi Arabia; needs disposable medical syringes; $250,000 worth; within three months."

The name of the company or institution, contact person, phone and fax number are also listed. So are the numbers of the company's bank and bank manager. "So that you can check their credit rating of course," says Feiler.

"A lot of the information we have is very sensitive," he explains as he quickly hides the computer screen. But not before I notice a surprising heading for a Middle East business directory: Snow skis.

"Snow skis?"

"Yes," acknowledges Feiler. "It's for a member of the royal family in Saudi Arabia. He is interested in starting a ski business for the elite in the Gulf region."

How does Info-Prod obtain such detailed information?

Feiler answers coyly, omitting at least as much as he reveals.

As a Middle East scholar — who still teaches at Tel Aviv and Bar Ilan universities — Feiler has spun a network of academic contacts throughout the Arab world over the last decade.

"I got to know many Arab academics very well at conferences. Some of these people have now become ministers in governments," he explains.

In addition, Info-Prod has a staff of 12 full-time researchers, all fluent in Arabic, who regularly review the Arab press and trade journals.

The company also uses less conventional methods of information-gathering. To compile lists of potential partners for business deals, Info-Prod officials interview local money-changers to see who needs capital. Advertisements run by Arab auditing firms, and registration forms required of companies that want to import raw materials are other sources tapped by the Tel Aviv company.

And who are Info-Prod's clients?

Feiler is equally tight-lipped. But in general the clientele includes American, Israeli and European firms, as well as Palestinian and Arab business people from all over the Middle East.

A Canadian company used Info-Prod's services to find a market in the Persian Gulf for Israeli and American-made medical equipment.

An Arab concern interested in purchasing agricultural equipment from an Israeli company hired Info-Prod to run a check on the firm.

Another client from an Arab country ordered a report on the cement market in the Middle East.

Bank Leumi turned to Info-Prod to help identify the sectors and businesses in the Arab market most likely to do business with Israel. The information was needed for the bank's recently-established $500 million dollar mutual investment fund for Israeli companies likely to benefit from peace.

Most recently, Info-Prod completed a comprehensive study of cataract surgery in the Arab world for an Israeli-American concern. The report included such details as the number of cataract operations conducted at specific hospitals and even the amount of a certain fluid used in each operation.

Feiler is quick to stress that Info-Prod does more than provide names and numbers. "We are not just a Dunn and Bradstreet of the Middle East," he maintains.

"We don't merely sell information; we develop a business strategy." This includes advising clients on the best fields and the most reliable businessmen, identifying the key players and establishing connections with them.

"The personal touch is very important in conducting business in the Arab world — much more so than it is among Western businessmen," says Feiler, recounting the story of a Forbes 400 company that tried to contact a Gulf state entrepreneur to explore a possible business venture.

"For a year, the American executive sent letters and faxes to the Arab businessman, but got no answer," says Feiler. "Eventually the American company turned to us to establish the connection. Coincidentally, I knew the Arab entrepreneur personally. Within minutes we had a joint meeting set up in Europe," says Feiler.

"The Arab businessman later explained that he wouldn't do business with someone he knew nothing about. Once I told him that this American was 'all right,' he got the seal of approval he needed."

It was a matter of needing assurance about the other person's character rather than his credit rating, explains Feiler.

It may sound odd, if not downright unbelievable, that Arab businessmen would turn to an Israeli company to screen potential business partners. But Feiler sees it as natural.

"We speak their language. We understand their culture. We have much more in common with them than, say, the Swiss or Americans do."

Whatever the reasons, this Israeli company is generating interest in the Arab world. In addition to a number of projects conducted for Arab clients — many of whom have visited the Tel Aviv office — there are other indications of Info-Prod's standing in neighboring countries.

There is, for instance, the front page article on the company that was recently in Jordan's largest daily newspaper. And there is the unusual curriculum vitae on Feiler's desk.

"It belongs to a Palestinian living in Amman who wants to be our representative in Jordan. He heard about us through the article in the Jordanian press," explains Feiler, who acknowledges having interviewed the potential employee recently in Tel Aviv.

Since signing of the Israel-PLO agreement, there has been a surge of interest in Middle East business ventures, says Feiler, estimating that the company has been getting about twice as many projects from Israeli and Arab entrepreneurs alike.

In the last few months, Info-Prod has acted as matchmaker in over 20 joint Israeli-Palestinian ventures.

But the company was established in 1991 — long before the signing of the accord.

Wertheim, who is president of the firm that bottles Coca-Cola in Israel, foresaw the economic opportunities that the peace process would bring and recruited Feiler to join him in the venture.

The two had worked together previously when Wertheim commissioned Feiler to conduct a study on the Arab boycott.

Feiler estimates that, despite the boycott, there is approximately $400 million in annual trade conducted between the Arab world and Israel. Once there is full peace in the region — and an end to the boycott — trade could reach about $2 billion a year, he says.

In the meantime, the university professor and the ex-Mossad agent continue to hold discreet meetings with Arab entrepreneurs who are not waiting for a formal peace accord to do business with Israel.

Israel, Jordan sign historic Declaration

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and Jordan's King Hussein signed an historic agreement Monday, ending the 46-year state of war between their countries.

The non-belligerency pact — not a formal peace treaty — was signed on the South Lawn of the White House, just yards from where Israel and the PLO signed their Declaration of Principles 10 months ago.

Under a canopy that included the Jordanian, Israeli and U.S. flags, Rabin and Hussein described the Washington Declaration as a major step on the road to normal relations between the two states.

"Millions of eyes all over the world are watching us now with great relief and great joy," Rabin said. "Yet another nightmare of war may be over. At the same time, millions of eyes in the Middle East are looking at us now with great heartfelt hope that our children and grandchildren will know no more war.

"We have gone here a long way towards a full treaty of peace and even though our work has not yet ended it is my hope and belief that not long from today we shall return to sign a final and permanent treaty of peace.

"We and Jordan have chosen to speak to each other rather than to continue the state of war."

Referring to the Declaration, Rabin said "it bears witness to our ability in Israel and Jordan to accelerate our efforts towards peace, to overcome obstacles, to achieve a breakthrough and put an end to 46 years of hostility."

In his remarks, Hussein called the Declaration "a modest and determined beginning to bring to our region and people security from fears."

It marks a step on the way to "normal" relations between the two peoples, the Jordanian monarch said, adding that he hoped "it ends the suspicion, the bitterness and the lack of human contact."

Appearing on U.S. television last Sunday, Secretary of State Warren Christopher said Monday's event demonstrates how "the walls are coming down in the Middle East, and it's a very exciting time.

"Added to the event with [PLO Chairman Yasser] Arafat last year, it really is both symbolic and a matter of substance. It means that there's an acceptance of Israel and there's an acceptance of peace. I don't think things will ever be the same again in the Middle East after these historic events," Christopher said.

Rabin arrived here at Andrews Air Force Base early Sunday to begin preparations for Monday's meeting.

Rabin's delegation included Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, Deputy Defence Minister Mordechai Gur and Defence Ministry legal adviser Elyakim Rubinstein, who was the chief negotiator in the Jordanian talks since they began nearly three years ago.

Also accompanying Rabin were several soldiers who fought the Jordanians in the War of Independence and the Six-Day War, and relatives of soldiers who fell in those wars.

While Rabin and Hussein meet publicly for the first time in Washington, Jordanians will officially step on Israeli soil for the first time.

Jordanian officials were due in Israel Monday to meet with Foreign Ministry staffers and lay the groundwork for the next round of peace talks expected to begin Aug. 8.

Buenos Aires relief fund

NEW YORK — B'nai B'rith and the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee have established relief funds to help rebuild the Buenos Aires Jewish community offices destroyed in the July 18 bombing, and to aid families of victims and those injured.

Donations in the form of checks can be sent to:

- B'nai B'rith Disaster Relief Fund, Attention: Argentina Jewish Community Fund, 1640 Rhode Island Ave. N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036, U.S.A. or
- JDC-Argentine Relief Fund, 711 Third Ave., New York, N.Y. 10017, U.S.A.

According to the World Jewish Congress, the director of the Latin American Jewish Congress, Manuel Tenenbaum, has requested that letters of support be faxed to the LAJC in Buenos Aires "as an important morale booster."

The fax number is 011-54-1-963-7056. The mailing address is: The DAIA, c/o Congress Judio Latino Americano; Casilla de Correro 20 (Suc. 53) 1453 Buenos Aires, Argentina.

Bomb blast shocks Argentinian Jews

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUENOS AIRES — Nothing will ever be the same for Argentina's Jews after last week's bomb attack on the community's headquarters.

On Monday, when the winter holiday is over, children were scheduled to return to school, and pupils at Jewish schools were to face tighter security than ever before.

For the first time, police cars are being stationed at the school doors, and as the children go inside, their school bags are being examined one by one.

And parents will soon hold assemblies in Jewish schools and clubs to decide what additional measures should be taken to beef up security.

Diana Katz, the mother of a girl who goes to the Scholem Aleijem School in Buenos Aires, said she will send her daughter to a non-Jewish school next year.

"I cannot live in fear. You never know what murderers may do," she said.

But Juana Kilzi, whose two grandchildren also go to a Jewish school, thought otherwise.

"We must not creep into basements" out of fear, she said.

But fear was nonetheless felt by many here in the wake of the July 18 bomb blast, which completely leveled a seven-story building housing the Jewish Kehilla, or Jewish community organizations.

The bomb struck one of the community's most important addresses. The building housed the DAIA, the umbrella organization of Argentine Jewry; the AMIA, the community's 100-year-old main social service agency for the poor and aged; a library of YIVO, the Jewish Research Institute; the archives on Jewish life in Argentina; and the Jewish Community Council, among other organizations.

At least 59 people are known to have died in the blast, and Jewish leaders are saying the toll may rise as high as 100.

The blast echoed the one that demolished the Israeli Embassy here in March 1992. No one was ever tried for that attack, which killed 30 and injured 250.

Ruben Beraja, president of the DAIA, has announced that Israeli companies and experts will be engaged to provide security for the 200 Jewish institutions in the country.

"We will have to invest millions of dollars to carry out this transformation, but we have no other alternative," Beraja said.

Delia Dordon, the headmistress of a Jewish school, explained what her first security measures will be.

"Even the crates with vegetables we receive will be opened. We will ask the janitors of the neighboring houses to cooperate so that no unfamiliar cars are allowed into garages. We will study the history of each one of the persons that we hire.

"Parking will be prohibited on the block where Jewish institutions are located, and every school and club will be searched four times daily, inch by inch," she said.

In spite of all the fears and difficulties with security, the Jewish community has made a unanimous decision: all Jewish institutions in Buenos Aires will open their doors for business as usual this week.

The Jewish resolve was bolstered after more than 150,000 people gathered last week in the city's Congress Square to repudiate the act of terror that had claimed so many lives.

The July 21 rally, occurring three days after the bombing took place, was described as the largest mass demonstration to take place in Argentina in the last 10 years.

Six blocks in one direction, two in the other, three blocks behind the platform, shoulder to shoulder, Argentines from all walks of life stood, mostly silent, many under umbrellas, in a cold and steady rain.

Rally repudiates terror attack

Banners of extraordinary length reading "Hoy somos todos Judios" — "Today we are all Jews" — were unfurled above the heads of scores of demonstrators.

Posters proclaiming the rally and urging all to attend and "stand up against violence" had been placed in stores throughout Buenos Aires.

"The trade unions collectively called for a work stoppage so that people could come to this event," said Jason Isaacson, an American Jewish Committee official who had flown here to express solidarity with Argentine Jews.

The Argentine government was shut down that day at 2 p.m. by presidential decree so that people could attend the rally, which began at 3:30 local time and lasted 90 minutes.

Sweet sounds emanate from subway stop

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The notes of a Bach sonata for solo violin float above the platform inside the Bloor-Yonge subway station, rising sweet and clear over the clatter of the trains hurtling along the tracks.

Ezra Atsmon, slight, bearded, is at his favorite TTC spot, open case at his feet, playing the music he loves. "Bach is for everyone, for all time," he maintains.

At first Atsmon is in his own world; then he begins to tap his foot as if to say, "Look at me! I'm here! I want to share this with you."

Several people scurry past but a plainly dressed woman stops against an opposite wall. Long shining hair, obviously her pride, falls forward as she listens entranced. Atsmon finishes and starts to put away his violin but the woman darts toward him, drops a bill into the case, pleading, "Oh no, not yet!" She's a regular. He plays some Mendelssohn. Others pause briefly.

Atsmon was born on Kibbutz Dan near Israel's Syrian border, but his parents, Holocaust survivors from Poland, moved with their three children from one farming village to another.

He was given his first violin at age seven because his mother's 17-year-old brother, a talented young violinist, had been murdered by the Nazis and she was determined that her son would carry on the family's musical tradition.

Before long Atsmon was earning scholarships through Keren Hatarbut, the American-Israel Foundation, which fostered both Itzhak Perlman and Pinchas Zuckerman. He says that Zuckerman's teacher, who tested him, told him he could be another Zuckerman.

Ezra Atsmon

At 15, Atsmon was admitted to Talma Yalin School for the Arts in Tel Aviv. Four years later, in the wake of the Yom Kippur War, he was called up and served three years with the tank corps.

Upon discharge he was accepted at the University of Tel Aviv's Academy of Music and chosen to study in Hanover — "Germany, of all places," he says.

However there were problems, differences of approach, and he first returned to Israel and then wandered through several countries, playing in the streets, under bridges, anywhere.

Restless, unsure, he put away the violin, tried computers, spent three "miserable" years on a kibbutz and became severely depressed.

But the violin was part of him and when he eventually picked it up again it felt right.

Settling in Gezer, a predominantly North American kibbutz, he continued with his music but also expanded a previous kibbutz career in cattle management. And he met Patricia, an opera singer and volunteer from Canada. Five years ago when she returned here, he followed her. They married and have a son Shlomo.

Venues for violinists, especially newcomers to Toronto, are scarce.

Atsmon worked as a dishwasher, then a Greenpeace canvasser. Feeling unfulfilled, he started to play the violin in subway stations without a TTC licence (only 16 were granted at the time). Regularly hassled and humiliated, picked up and fined, he was always on the alert to grab his violin and run.

Finally he decided to stop paying fines and challenge the system. Appearing in court on a charge of operating a musical instrument without earphones, he explained that he didn't use an amplifier and therefore no earphones were needed. The case was dismissed but the judge noted that in the future he could be charged with soliciting.

Eight unpaid fines later he was back in court for soliciting. But this time he had help from Jeffrey Neiman, a young lawyer and classical music buff who had heard Atsmon's Bach in the subway and offered to defend him without a fee.

Neiman argued that there was no solicitation since Atsmon just played; he didn't approach anyone. The case was dismissed and this judge commented that buskers — street performers — add flavor to the city.

Since Atsmon considered the TTC's strict limitation of licences unfair, he organized Troubador Day, a demonstration by some 30 performers inside the Bloor-Bathurst subway station.

Even before Atsmon's second court date, TTC officials realized that this upstart violinist would not go away and they invited him in for a talk. Following Troubador Day he got his audition and his licence.

In short order the number of licences was upped frm 16 to 42. Today it stands at 75. Not everyone is accepted. Annual auditions are held and the standards are high. Performers must requalify each year.

What does it feel like, playing in the subway?

"In a lot of ways I like it," Atsmon insists. "I play to the people; I get feedback. I'm not on a stage separated from them, performing frozen music." But there's a downside. It's discouraging when he's ignored. "I get mad," Atsmon says, "but I have to keep quiet."

There can be unexpected encouragement. At the suggestion of an impressed bypasser, Atsmon will be showcased in a 20-minute segment of CBC Sunday Arts Entertainment called Busker's Bach, which will air on network TV in the late fall.

Atsmon doesn't want to make music underground forever. Clearly an individualist, he dreams of performing on his own terms as a respected artist.

Emerging from the subway into the sunlight, he passes a piper in kilts at the corner of Bloor and Yonge and quickly drops a coin into the man's open case.

Israeli MiA group joins Network to promote cause

Baumel seeks fate of youngest child

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When Israel is at war it is taboo to ring doorbells. The sound of the doorbell usually means a military representative is bringing bad news from the front.

But Miriam and Yona Baumel, Americans who had made aliyah, didn't know this when they innocently rang the doorbell of friends in June 1982 during the early days of the Lebanon war.

They had unwittingly alarmed their friends whose son was at the front.

On a recent visit to Toronto as part of her campaign tour on behalf of all the Israeli MiAs, Baumel spoke at an informal meeting organized by the International Coalition for Missing Israeli Soldiers (ICMIS). She said the significance of the ringing doorbell became clear to her and her husband soon enough.

One afternoon in 1982 the doorbell rang at their Jerusalem apartment. The news was grim. Zachary, their youngest child, was missing in action (MiA).

According to Miriam Baumel, they have never received any conclusive information about the fate of their son despite their tireless campaign to find out. They have contacted politicians, secret agents, defence force personnel and even launched their own investigation.

In the past 12 years there have been leads and reported sightings of Zachary Baumel. And in January, Baumel said, PLO contacts returned half of his dog tag to government officials. But the Baumels are still no closer to knowing whether their son is dead or alive.

"It is a horror. Uncertainty is the worst thing a family can go through," she said.

Last December a group of students joined forces with the Baumels and the families of the other MiAs to form the ICMIS. Danny Eisen, a former Torontonian, was one of the founders of this organization.

At the same meeting, he said he had been interested in the plight of the MiAs for years. But when the peace process began and there was no mention of the MiAs, Eisen decided to muster more public support for them.

He and some friends joined with the Baumels last November to form the ICMIS. It's a one-issue organization with one basic platform.

Organizers want to make sure the political leadership will do everything in its power to resolve the situation with the MiAs as soon as possible.

"For the first time all the parties related to the issue are in direct negotiation," Eisen said. "And this represents the best and possibly the last opportunity to bring the missing soldiers home."

But he said time is running out, because the deals in the Middle East are being made now and to date the plight of the MiAs has not been a priority for the government.

The ICMIS is raising funds through the Jewish Students Network to support an advertising and information campaign to promote the MiA issue.

The campaign is aimed at Israelis, Eisen said, because they need to pressure the politicians to negotiate with Yasser Arafat.

A recent poll conducted by the ICMIS indicated 87 per cent of Israelis wanted the government to halt the release of Palestinian prisoners until Arafat provides more information about the MiAs.

Eisen thinks Arafat is the key to getting this matter resolved because Baumel's dog tag was recovered through PLO sources.

But the government, he said, lacks the political will to press Arafat for this information because they want to forge ahead with the peace process regardless of its cost to the MiAs and their families.

To date there are six MiAs: Baumel, Yehuda Katz, Zvi Feldman, Yosef Fink, Rahamim Alsheikh, and Ron Arad. The outcome of their situation is of great concern to many Israelis, Eisen said.

"We have had a very noticeable response from many Israelis, particularly students who are waiting to be drafted. They basically say, 'Is anyone going to come and get me if I go missing?' "

Miriam Baumel said she gets many calls from parents of children in the army, parents who are upset that Israel is not taking care of its own children.

Baumel said working for her son's release helps her cope with her situation.

Prospect of Charbonneau candidacy upsets Jews

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The prospect of the Liberal candidacy of Yvon Charbonneau has shocked many members of the Jewish community.

Charbonneau is the Quebec union leader who visited Libya at the invitation of Col. Muammar Khaddafy and was an outspoken critic of Israel through the 1970s and early 1980s.

By the end of last week, Charbonneau's candidacy in the northeast Montreal riding of Bourassa was awaiting the confirmation of Premier Daniel Johnson. The riding is now held by Liberal Louise Robic, a former cabinet minister.

Charbonneau, well-known for his left-wing politics two decades ago, was leader of the Centrale de l'Enseignement du Quebec (CEQ), the largest teachers' federation in the province. He openly called for anti-Zionism, particularly Israel's alleged war on the Palestinians, to be taught in the schools, and the CEQ formed close links with Palestinian spokesmen.

He was involved in a Libyan-based organization that declared itself opposed to all forms of racism and especially Zionism.

In 1983, he led the demonstration against a visit by Ariel Sharon, former Israeli defence minister and general of the Israeli forces' invasion of Lebanon.

Sharon, who was invited to speak at a fundraising dinner for Jerusalem's Shaare Zedek Hospital, touched off weeks of acrimonious exchange between those for and those against his coming here. The controversy culminated in two large simultaneous demonstrations, with protestors from each side kept apart by police in a one-block buffer zone.

In the mid-1980s, Charbonneau was named director of the Quebec government's Bureau d'Audiences Publiques sur l'Environnement by then environment minister Lise Bacon, who turfed out the widely respected Victor Goldbloom, who had not held the job for long.

Since that time, Charbonneau has not had a high public profile and has made no public comments on the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Thomas Hecht, chair of the Quebec wing of the Canada-Israel Committee, who led the pro-Sharon forces during that controversial visit, said he was "shocked" by Charbonneau's unopposed nomination and feels it would be "insensitive to the Jewish community," if Johnson endorses his candidacy.

Hecht said he is most surprised that a strong nationalist like Charbonneau would run for the Liberals.

D'Arcy McGee independent candidate Robert Libman called Charbonneau's nomination "an outrage to the Jewish and anglophone communities" and asked Johnson to block his candidacy.

Libman pointed to a 1984 Gazette article detailing Charbonneau's association with the Libyan anti-racist group and the PLO, as well as to a column by Charbonneau in La Presse that year, in which he wrote that "as long as [Israel's] political and social system is based on discrimination, oppression, expansionism and confusion between religion and politics," there will be no peace.

Libman also recalled Charbonneau's one-time staunch French-only stance and his denunciation of Alliance Quebec as a "group of extremists."

"In light of Mr. Charbonneau's virulently anti-Israel and anti-anglophone views, it is astounding that Daniel Johnson would name such a person to represent the Liberal party at any level. This shows a blatant disregard for the sensitivities of Quebec's Jewish and anglophone communities," Libman said.

D'Arcy McGee Liberal candidate Lawrence Bergman declined to make any immediate comment on the matter.

The chair of the Liberal campaign, John Parisella, did not return calls from The CJN last week.

Parti Quebecois international affairs critic Andre Boulerice, who remembers well Charbonneau's flirtation with Khaddafy, was bemused by his new association with the Liberal party. Boulerice, the MNA for Ste. Marie-St. Jacques, sympathized with the Jewish community's distress over the party's embracing a person with such a history.

Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q), however, has not become involved in the issue. Executive director Michael Crelinsten said CJC will not interfere with the nomination process.

Noting that Charbonneau has not done anything contentious in 10 years leads Crelinstein to believe he has "evolved in his attitudes.

"We're not going to jump in and condemn him now," he said.

Montreal's Lubavitch community still vibrant after Rebbe's death

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The billboard outside the Lubavitch yeshivah on Westbury Avenue proclaims "Moshiach is on His way — Let's be Ready."

Montreal's Lubavitch community appears to have lost little of its zeal in working towards messianic times despite the death of Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson in June.

However, it is at pains to explain to those outside the community how it can reconcile its belief in the rebbe's power to deliver them with the fact of his death.

"Our faith in the Rebbe's prophecy that we stand on the threshold of the messianic era has not changed. It is taking a different course, but the result will be the same," said Rabbi Moishe New, director of Lubavitch's Torah Centre, an adult education program in Montreal.

Rabbi New was one of the strongest proponents of the idea that Rabbi Schneerson was, indeed, the Mashiach. He continues to believe that Rabbi Schneerson, though physically removed from the world, is directing the Lubavitch movement and preparing the world for redemption.

"The rebbe is not reposing in paradise," Rabbi New said.

Montreal's Lubavitch community, founded over 50 years ago, claims about 3,000 members, making it the third largest in North America after New York and Los Angeles.

Among the 14 Lubavitch institutions are two schools, two camps and eight Chabad Houses, all operating on an annual budget estimated between $6 million and $7 million.

Rabbi New said his community's ability to cope so well proves that Lubavitchers were right in dedicating their lives to Rabbi Schneerson.

More than 1,000 attended the recent shloshim service at the Beth Israel Beth Aaron synagogue, marking the end of the 30-day mourning period.

Rabbi New and Rabbi Ronnie Fine, director of Chabad House — two of the local community's main spokesmen — share the opinion that the Lubavitch movement will not split or disintegrate with the loss of its leader.

"We have surprised the world by not falling apart, as so many people predicted," Rabbi New said.

Rabbi Fine said "the rebbe personifies the Torah and what being Jewish is all about. That has not stopped...We believe as strongly today as before that, as the rebbe said, the world is on the verge of a time of peace, goodness and godliness."

They both discounted the possibility of a new rebbe. "The rebbe's only successor is Mashiach," Rabbi Fine said. "And it will be soon." He said the Mashiach may come in a form not easily comprehensible to humans.

As for Rabbi Schneerson, Rabbi Fine said he was not revered because of his charismatic personality or as a "miracle maker," but rather because he "brought alive all of God's teachings."

Rabbi Fine likened the rebbe's passing to a death in the family that brings relatives closer together. If anyone has left the community, he said, it is likely their faith was not strong enough or they misunderstood the concept of Mashiach.

That 3,000-strong community includes some who do not wear "a black hat and beard," Rabbi Fine said, while many non-Lubavitch benefit from programs like its Hebrew classes and its anti-drug project conducted in public schools.

It also conducted a high profile Mashiach campaign, erecting billboards on highways welcoming the messiah and taking full-page ads in daily newspapers.

"On the whole, we do not feel we did anything wrong or foolish. We were following what the Torah dictates," Rabbi Fine said. "Certainly, the rebbe gave many hints and signs that it was he."

Rabbi New thinks the community may have gone a little too far in declaring Rabbi Schneerson as the Mashiach. "The rebbe did not tell us he was the Mashiach. We made some assumptions based on Torah."

The community intends to continue its outreach to other Jews, but will keep its message to "exactly what the rebbe said," according to Rabbi New. "We are finding a lot of inspiration and direction in his discourses and letters."

The sign outside the yeshivah includes the phone number for a multilingual tape message attempting to explain the "perplexing" moshiach issue. On one day, it speaks of the "quagmire of conflict" the world is in and how peace will reign during the messianic age.

But the narrator — a man with a voice of broadcast quality — warns that the rational person should be skeptical of any purported messiah who can "wave a magic wand." The Mashiach Lubavitchers await is a "fundamental concept in Judaism," who will lead mankind to realization of "our potential for self-transformation."

Israel group to train young female leaders

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The founder and director of a fledgling Israeli project aimed at turning select young women into a generation of activists and leaders says that studying Quebec society has made her task easier.

Calanit Dovere took part in an international conference earlier this year on the development of young leadership held at John Abbott College.

But it was the obvious cultural diversity of Quebec that will help her to build her new organization, called Mo'adon Nisan, said Dovere, 23, a graduate of Columbia University who lives in Tel Aviv.

"The cultural diversity here is the kind of thing we can analyze and take back to Israel," Dovere, who holds a Master's degree in international law and human rights, said in a telephone interview.

The structure and general terms of reference of Mo'adon Nisan, in Dovere's view, sets it apart from other organizations in Israel geared for young people.

First, says Dovere, the project, launched just this year, specificially targets girls entering Grade 11 from all segments of the population. At seven of the Haifa high schools where the project is being initiated and is recruiting its first 28 participants, for example, four of the schools are Jewish, two are Arab and one is Druze. The program, conducted in Hebrew and Arabic, received over 100 applications, with acceptances based on consulations with school officials, academic achievement and personal interviews.

At the moment, the short-term focus of Mo'adon Nisan is on developing young Israeli representation for the fourth World Conference on Women, scheduled to take place August 30-Sept. 8 next year in Beijing, China.

The longer-term goal, she said, will be to build a new and informed generation of social and political leadership in Israel from all segements of its society.

In Beijing, representatives from Mo'adon Nisan will be part of the general Israeli delegation at a pre-conference forum for non-governmental organizations. But they will also meet with peers from all over the world to discuss the new organization during specially-designated "youth tent activities."

The preparation for the conference — as well as increasing the visibility of Mo'adon Nisan in Israel — will take the form of weekly, four-hour sessions, ranging from sessions on the status of women in Israel to leadership training workshops, independent projects and language-skills development.

Once the conference is over, Mo'adon Nisan participants will be expected to complete a series of independent projects and to evaluate and make recommendations for the Mo'adon Nissim groups that will be developed for the next year in Haifa and, hopefully, other parts of Israel.

"We are presenting our work as a model for young women to act together, to take initiatives, to change society for the better," Dovere says. "The eventual goal will be to expand the proram throughout Israel — for girls and boys."

Dovere herself seems to be the sort of person who could have graduated from the very program she just founded. Over the last year, she lobbied for the promotion of youth issues at a United Nations NGO conference in New York in March and took part at Israel's Commission on the Status of Women.

Her presence at the conference in Montreal was made possible through the sponsorship of the American-Israel Cultural Foundation.

Dovere, however, stressed that she does not run the Mo'adon Nisan project singlehandedly. Three women — Dahlia Berani, Ruth Ben-Artzi and Abir Igbaria — are the project's counsellors. In Haifa, participants conduct their activities at the Golda Meir Mount Carmel Training Centre.

The Hebrew term Mo'adon Nisan essentially translates into a "gathering place for new life," since Nisan "is the month of spring and new life in Hebrew and Arabic," the project's inaugural newsletter noted.

'Great Debate' fizzles as Rabbi Bulka withdraws

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

OTTAWA — It was the Great Debate that never was.

Last week's much-touted verbal set-to here between Rabbi Reuven Bulka and fiery Muslim cleric Sheikh Ahmed Deedat of South Africa fizzled, as Rabbi Bulka withdrew at the last moment.

Instead, the controversial Deedat, president of the Durban-based Islamic Propagation Centre International, spoke solo to at least 1,000 people, mostly Muslims, at Ottawa's Civic Centre.

The July 19 event, billed as The Great Debate — Islam or Judaism: which has the solution to world problems?, would have pitted the two religious leaders in an adversarial environment.

That was precisely the problem, according to Rabbi Bulka, spiritual leader of Congregation Machzikei Hadas.

"I was originally approached on the basis of a debate," Rabbi Bulka told The CJN. "I said, 'Absolutely not.' I did not want a debate. I wanted a discussion."

Rabbi Bulka said he was under the impression the event would be a dialogue on how to improve relations between Muslims and Jews.

" I had no problem with that. In the end, the publicity got huge and it became a debate."

Rabbi Bulka backed out the morning of the debate. In a letter to Ottawa's Islamic Information Centre, he said the evening was intended "not to be a debate, but a dialogue ... Unfortunately, the hype for this event, over which you had little control, has escalated this into a debate.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka

"Whilst I have never feared debating people in general, the matter of our communities working together is too important for me to risk it in an evening that may send off sparks of discord and enmity.

"In a time when peace between Israel and its Arab neighbors is moving ahead, albeit slowly but nevertheless inexorably, debates are retrogressive," the letter stated.

Mahmoud Abbas of the Islamic Information Centre told The CJN he understood Rabbi Bulka's decision in the wake of tensions arising from the Buenos Aires bombing.

"But it would have been a great dialogue," he added.

Deedat plans to offer Rabbi Bulka a fully-paid trip to South Africa to have the debate, Abbas noted.

He said Deedat ended up speaking to about 2,000 people at the Civic Centre. Asked whether the sheikh said anything inflammatory about Jews, Abbas said, "not at all."

A different view was taken by a Jewish woman who attended the event.

She told The CJN that Deedat, in a 90-minute address, mocked Judaism, saying it is "headed for destruction." She said he quoted rabbis out of context.

"His remarks were inflammatory, offensive and denigrating, not only to all Jews but particularly to Rabbi Bulka," said the woman, a Holocaust survivor who did not want her name used.

"I remember hearing speeches like this by Hitler, exactly as sweeping and enticing."

She said the wide applause at the end of Deedat's speech made her "sick at heart."

Last week in Toronto, Deedat made another controversial appearance in which he told thousands that Jesus Christ was not crucified.

In a debate with Christian evangelist William Wakefield, Deedat questioned why Mary Magdalene went to Jesus' tomb. "Mark tells us, 'She went to to anoint Him' ... I'm asking, do Jews massage dead bodies after three days?"

Canadian Jewish Congress says it has extensive files on Deedat and examples of anti-Semitic and anti-Zionist statements he has made in the past.

Finta fallout concerns Jewish groups

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Hitler must not be handed a posthumous victory.

Strong words at any time, but even more so when made in response to a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada.

Nevertheless, it was a decision by Canada's highest court, in the case of accused war criminal Imre Finta, that strained the patience of some Jewish groups and prompted the Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association (CHRA) to circulate a petition calling for changes to the Criminal Code pertaining to war crimes.

The court's ruling "would exonerate persons committing war crimes and crimes against humanity based on 'obedience to superior orders,' " the petition states.

That situation must be corrected by parliament's passing legislation to make Canada's law consistent with its international obligations to prosecute war criminals, the petition adds.

At the same time, B'nai Brith Canada has announced that it intends to file a complaint over the Finta case with two United Nations organizations: the Human Rights Committee of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights.

Both Jewish organizations argue that the Supreme Court's ruling, while upholding Canada's war crimes legislation, makes successful criminal prosecutions virtually impossible.

The decision permits the use of the defence of obedience to orders of a superior — a defence discredited during the postwar Nuremberg trials, said CHRA vice-president Sabina Citron.

It also allows an accused war criminal to argue he did not think his actions were illegal, since society at the time believed that Jews were unsympathetic or hostile to the state. The Supreme Court has, in effect, permitted an accused war criminal to raise a defence of racial prejudice, B'nai Brith and the CHRA say.

Similar arguments were advanced by the Justice Department's war crimes unit, which joined B'nai Brith, CHRA, Canadian Jewish Congress and Interamicus in asking the High Court to convene a special hearing to clarify part of its judgment. The Supreme Court turned down the request without giving reasons.

The Supreme Court's judgment "implies that adverse propaganda against an oppressed minority can be used to inflict further persecutions," Citron said. Strong community support for legislative change is necessary to influence the minister to act on the petition, she added.

But not all Jewish groups agree the legislation needs change. While Congress believes the judgment makes it more difficult to prove an accused's "guilty mind," the defence of superior orders would not be effective in a situation where the accused war criminal's activities were particularly egregious. Had Finta been accused of mowing down Jewish civilians with a machine gun, these defences would not come into play, said Jack Silverstone, national executive-director of Congress.

Finta, a former captain in the Hungarian gendarmerie, was charged with robbery, forcible confinement, kidnapping and manslaughter, in connection with the wartime round-up and deportation of 8,617 Jews in the southern Hungarian city of Szeged. He was acquitted on all charges.

The Ontario Court of Appeal and later the Supreme Court turned down appeals by federal prosecutors and the interveners.

"Our position in the wake of the Finta decision was not pessimistic," Silverstone said. " We felt [it] would not be an impediment to a prosecution where the acts were so egregious that a Canadian jury would be unlikely to acquit."

Silverstone reserved his harshest critique for the war crimes unit, which has launched only four criminal prosecutions and one denaturalization/deportation case in seven years.

Since Jacob Luitjens was successfully deported to Holland two years ago, the unit has not pursued that track at all, he said. "Years are going by and nothing is going forward. This points to the very credibility of the unit," Silverstone said.

Justice Minister Allan Rock has said he is studying a number of dossiers on his desk, but no new cases have resulted, he added.

Cyrus Reporter, a special assistant to Rock, said the minister "has instructed his officials to review the [Finta] decision and to consider whether legislative amendments are necessary or possible." Reporter declined to indicate whether Rock had approved or turned down any new prosecutions.

B'nai Brith legal counsel Marvin Kurz was also disenchanted with federal prosecutors. Examining the impact of the court decision in the context of 50 years of Canadian inaction on war crimes, he said, "I find it difficult to believe that any Nazi war criminals will come to trial."

In recent years, Kurz said, B'nai Brith has urged the war crimes unit to change tacks and employ the denaturalization procedure, which, due to its lower standard of proof, is more likely to achieve success.

Meanwhile, B'nai Brith hopes that by raising the Finta case before the UN groups, it may spur the government to amend its war crimes legislation.

At this point, given his pessimism about the prospect of Nazi war criminal prosecutions, Kurz said he is fighting for war crimes victims in Rwanda, Bosnia and Somalia.

However, he is not very hopeful.

"Finta has answered our worst fears of how the Canadian criminal justice system will deal with war criminals," he said.

Canadian university presidents take part in unique Israel tour

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — Dr. James Downey waited nearly 30 years to visit Israel.

His first attempt in 1965 was frustrated when Jordanian authorities would not grant him a visa to enter what was then the divided city of Jerusalem. Early this month, the University of of Waterloo president finally set foot in Jerusalem.

Downey was one of 17 Canadian university presidents who visited the city as part of a unique tour of Israel organized by the Canadian Jewish Congress.

"This is the first time that so many university presidents from any country in the world have visited Israel at one time," said CJC president Prof. Irving Abella, who led the delegation. "The purpose of the trip was to enable Canadian university presidents to meet with their Israeli counterparts, discuss common problems, and encourage joint research."

Met political leaders

During the week-long trip, the heads of universities from across Canada visited all seven Israeli universities, and met with several Israeli leaders, including President Ezer Weizman, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, Education Minister Amnon Rubinstein, Immigration Minister Yair Tsaban, and Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Ohmert. The whirlwind tour took them from Metulla to the Negev, and included visits to Christian and Jewish holy sites, a strategic tour of the Golan Heights, and a stop at Massada.

For many participants, it was their first chance to see Israel.

"I had planned to visit the country many times, but it never worked out," Downey said. "This invitation was a perfect opportunity."

Downey said he was especially moved by a visit to an immigrant absorption centre. "When we heard the stories of some of the Russian and Ethiopian immigrants, there wasn't a dry eye in the group."

For Wilfred Laurier University president Dr. Lorna Marsden, the highlight of the trip was meeting an alumnus in the Negev desert: a Bedouin social worker who completed his master's degree at the Kitchener university. "It was very gratifying to see him at work in his community, applying many of the models he learned in our faculty," said Marsden.

She said she would like to establish a scholarship program to enable other students from the Negev, especially Bedouins, to study at Wilfred Laurier.

Marsden, a former senator, has been to Israel several times. "But nothing stays the same here," she laughed. The most striking change? "The increasing equity of women in academia. Last time I was here, this subject wasn't taken seriously. Now it has become a real issue."

During meetings with Israeli leaders, military experts and academics — as well as Palestinian university officials — participants heard a variety of viewpoints on the Arab-Israeli conflict. "I found out enough on this trip to tell me how little I know," said Dr. Arthur May, president of Memorial University of Newfoundland. "This is a very complicated part of the world and anyone who makes quick judgments probably makes the wrong judgments."

The visit also provided an opportunity to see some of Israel's lesser-known universities. "The Hebrew University of Jerusalem is one of the great universities of the world. But I was very impressed by the high quality of Israel's other universities as well," said Dr. Marcel Hamelin, president of the University of Ottawa. "Ben-Gurion University was especially striking for the contribution it makes to its milieu, the Negev desert.

"What was really amazing was how similar Israeli and Canadian universities are," he said. "We are preoccupied with the same problems: preserving the autonomy of the university, raising the level of teaching and meeting the budgetary challenge."

That sentiment was echoed by many of the university presidents.

"It was clear that we, in Canada, have more in common with Israeli universities than with American ones," said Dr. Susan Mann, president of York University. "The part-public, part-private nature of universities is exactly the same. And so is the problem of insufficient government funding."

"The way Israeli universities see themselves — as both teaching and research institutions — was interesting to us because this is now the subject of a major debate in Canadian universities," said Dr. John Stubbs, president of Simon Fraser University. "I saw a lot of colleagues taking notes."

Some participants found specific areas for future collaboration with their Israeli counterparts. A Ben-Gurion University medical expert was intrigued by Memorial University's use of interactive television to reach remote parts of Newfoundland.

Medical data

"We transmit medical data, such as X-rays, over long distances instantly. That enables a community physician to consult with a specialist 500 miles away," explained Memorial University president Dr. Arthur May. "We then use same equipment to teach algebra and other subjects to students in four different locations simultaneously.

"A community doctor at Ben-Gurion University thought this system might be very useful in the Negev desert, so I plan to put him in touch with the people who run the program at Memorial."

Nearly all participants expressed interest in expanding joint research and exchange programs between Canadian and Israeli universities.

"We hope to convince the Canadian government to start a joint research fund for this purpose," said CJC president Abella, noting that Israel already has such arrangements with several other countries, including the U.S. and Germany.

During the trip, the group visited the University of Haifa, the Technion-Israel Institute of Technology, Bar-Ilan University, Tel Aviv University, Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, the Weizmann Institute of Science and the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Dr. Robert Pritchard of the University of Toronto (standing) was one of the presidents of Canadian universities taking part in the Canadian Jewish Congress mission to Israel held early in July. He is seen here at Tel Aviv University, addressing a luncheon of academics. With him are, from left, Prof. Irving Abella, president of Congress; Prof. Yoram Dinstein, president of Tel Aviv University; and Dr. Geraldine Kenny-Wallace of McMaster University.

Israel, Jordan sign agreement

Rabin, Hussein and their respective delegations arrived at the White House Monday morning and signed the official guest book. Each group met for 10 minutes with President Bill Clinton.

With only journalists and diplomats attending, Clinton presided over a brief Rose Garden welcoming ceremony, in which each of the leaders spoke for two minutes. The three leaders then adjourned to the Cabinet Room for an hour-long meeting.

At the same time, First Lady Hillary Rodham Clinton met with Leah Rabin and Jordan's Queen Noor, who is American-born.

Clinton, Hussein and Rabin then addressed 500 invited guests on the South Lawn. Rabin and Hussein publicly shook hands for the first time.

The choreography of the handshake had been carefully worked out over the past few days, a White House official said, with advisers trying not to precisely duplicate the September 13 Rabin-Arafat handshake.

On Monday evening, Clinton was to host the first White House dinner honoring Israeli and Arab leaders.

On Tuesday morning, Rabin and Hussein were to address a joint session of the U.S. Congress. Foreign heads of state have addressed Congress before, but two have never appeared together.

Federation, JCC agree to new bailout plan

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto has come to the rescue of the Jewish Community Centre — again.

Reprising a role it played last April, the Federation last week agreed to a new plan that will see it bail out the JCC and put the community centre on the road to a sounder financial footing.

The new arrangement is similar to one that had been negotiated last spring between the JCC, the Federation and the Bank of Montreal, but which fell through when the JCC did not meet the financial conditions set by the bank, its principal creditor.

Under terms of the plan agreed to unanimously in a recent meeting of 19 Federation officers, the Federation will lend the JCC $5 million, $4.5 million of which is to go towards payment of the JCC's $9.5 million bank debt. The remaining half-million dollars will go towards operating expenses of the JCC and the Federation will guarantee the bank $500,000 at the end of five years.

In return, the Federation will get a first mortgage on the property at 4588 Bathurst Street.

In addition, the community Endowment Fund will advance $1.8 million to the JCC as a loan prior to closing the deal. Of that amount, $700,000 has already been allocated — $300,000 to make part payments on the JCC's water, gas and hydro bills and to meet its most recent payroll. A further $400,000 was allocated earlier to pay some of the JCC's creditors.

The JCC will retain ownership of the buildings on Bathurst Street but a new corporation will be established to operate the facilities. The Federation will appoint 50 percent of the board of that non-profit entity and have right of approval over the remaining 50 percent, giving it de facto control over management of the JCC.

The modified agreement does not affect plans for the Bloor Street and Northeast Valley branches of the JCC. Both will see membership groups embark on fundraising campaigns to raise money that will go towards paying the bank debt — $3 million from the Bloor branch, $1 million from the Valley. Users groups will take over ownership of the branches.

The current agreement differs from the aborted April deal in a number of key respects. The Federation has determined it will borrow the $5 million it will lend the JCC, said Howard English, a spokesman for the Federation and the JCC. The United Israel Appeal (UIA) will co-sign the loan and the UIA will pay the interest on the loan, he added. Under the earlier terms, the money was to be taken from funds that had been earmarked for the UIA.

Instead of the Federation's obtaining ownership of the Bathurst Street facilities, it will take back a first mortgage on the building.

And instead of advancing the $1.8 million after closing, that is, after the JCC had satisfied the Federation it would provide the building free and clear of all charges, the Endowment Fund will do so before closing.

That puts the Endowment Fund money at some risk, English acknowledged, because "if the deal doesn't close, there will be no way to recover the money. But we are very confident the deal will close."

English said that Revenue Canada, which is owed about $700,000, has been "extremely patient and understanding. It will have to be paid at some point," he said.

Federation president Bernard Ghert said it was imperative that the Federation act to protect the facilities for the community.

"The JCC wanted to do it this way and we're trying to remove as many obstacles to getting it done," Ghert told The CJN. "We had to get it done quickly. We need to get the community confidence back."

Ghert said the reputation of the JCC in the community was deteriorating, making any future marketing plans a hard sell.

In addition, the Federation was experiencing a drain on its resources as it employed staff and laypeople in trying to help resolve the JCC's problems. Federation people have been working on marketing and renovation plans, among other tasks, Ghert said.

"This way, we will show the Jewish and financial communities that the Federation has done everything we could to save the facilities and to ensure that the financial institutions are not at risk," he said.

The deal was the best that could be arranged under the circumstances, Ghert added. "The reason we're doing this is that it's an important facility for the community."

He said he expects the deal to be finalized by the end of August.

Bomb shocks Argentinian Jews

While the entire Jewish community seemed to be there, they were nonetheless outnumbered by non-Jews, and were joined by scores of Jews from other countries.

The crowd first sang the Argentine national anthem. Then came Hatikvah, the Israeli national anthem, though most in the crowd were not able to participate.

Isaacson, director of government and international affairs for AJCommittee, attended the rally with Jacobo Kovadloff, an Argentine who represented AJCommittee in Argentina until 1973.

Kovadloff then moved to New York and is AJCommittee consultant for Latin American affairs.

He had gone home to find death and destruction and unbearable sadness.

Isaacson, who had never been in Argentina, found a country in mourning. But he said he was deeply moved that the news of the bombing was being covered by all newspapers, with pages upon pages of text and photos and editorials.

Roxana Rizzo, a young Catholic girl in the crowd, had a Magen David pinned to her chest, because, as she explained, "Today, I'm also Jewish."

Close by, Yang Baek, a Protestant from Korea, carried a sign in her own language, which she translated: "Let's clean up the garbage."

"We Koreans have also closed our shops today. In the Once district (the city's traditional Jewish neighborhood), the Jews are our neighbors and we get along fine," Yang said.

Argentina's president, Carlos Menem, who has a friendly relationship with the Jewish community, was booed when he appeared. He did not address the rally, but other government figures and Jewish leaders did.

Many in the Jewish community here believe that the government has not done enough to protect Jewish institutions. They remember the failure of the government investigation into the 1992 attack on the Israeli Embassy that killed 30 people. Many believe that if the terrorists had been found, this latest attack would not have occurred.

Beraja of the DAIA reflected this feeling when he spoke at the rally:

"Terror comes to those societies where justice is weak and where the systems for prevention and punishment are not efficient," he said.

Meanwhile, the survivors of the attack and the relatives of the dead and missing await an explanation.

Salomon Belgorovski is still searching for a reason for the death of his wife, Dorita.

Belgorovski, who worked in the treasury department of the community building, jumped into the inner yard when he felt the floor move, the furniture fly and the ceiling collapse.

He called out to his wife, who also worked in the building, but there was no answer.

Rosa Montagno, pregnant with her third child and on her way to the doctor, passed the ill-fated building just as the blast occurred. Her 6-year-old son, Sebastian, was killed instantly. Montagno is recovering in the hospital.

Perhaps the most dramatic story was that of Jacobo Chemanuel, the man in charge of the building's coffee shop.

Twelve hours after the attack, firemen heard his voice under the rubble. Saving his life became a national obsession as his rescue was broadcast live. Removing stones and beams to reach him, firemen made a tunnel to put coffee within his reach and talked to him so he wouldn't fall asleep.

A full 31 hours later, Chemanuel was rescued and rushed to the hospital to undergo two operations. Later his right foot was amputated. But with it all, Chemanuel, a diabetic with a heart condition, was fighting against the odds. His heart failed and Chemanuel died last Friday afternoon.

In a search for answers to the tragedy, Isaacson and Kovadloff met last Friday with leaders of Jewish groups, Israeli Embassy personnel and with Argentine Foreign Minister Guido di Tella and Interior Minister Carlos Ruckauff.

When Isaacson asked if the attack could have involved tie-ins among former Nazis who found haven in Argentina and other South American countries, neo-Nazis and Islamic extremist groups, he was told: "It's a possibility."

The Jewish leaders were also told it was possible that Muslim extremist groups were operating in Argentina.

A southern Lebanon-based Islamic group, calling itself the Supporters of God, has claimed responsibility for the July 18 attack.

Little is known about this organization, but the group reportedly issued a statement three months ago from the Lebanese town of Sidon promising all-out war against Israel.

If their claim proves true, it would bear out Israel's assertion last week that a Middle East terror group was behind the bombing.

Isaacson said he was told by many that "Argentina is a sieve; that it is not difficult to get either contraband or undesirables into the country and out again."

There have been some reports from other South American countries that there were or would be attempts on Jewish or Israeli targets in the region.

In Uruguay, a prominent newspaper confirmed a rumor that had been circulating in February that a Lebanese terrorist, Ahmad al-Maked, had come to the country to try to poison meat that was being exported to Israel.

The report said that Uruguayan security sources foiled the attempt.

Also, Chilean authorities were reportedly alerted more than a month ago to "information about a possible attack in the region" on a Jewish or Israeli target.

According to reports, this information was not passed along to higher-ups in the Foreign Ministry or to other countries.

Meanwhile, synagogues throughout Argentina held special services last Friday night.

Explosion downs Panamanian airplane

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PANAMA CITY — Emanuel Attie was on his way to meet his daughter at the Shevet Achim synagogue in Panama City to set a date for her wedding.

Solomon Chochron was also headed for the synagogue, hoping to make it in time for afternoon prayers.

Neither man ever made it.

The two were among the 21 victims of last week's deadly plane explosion that took the lives of 12 members of Panama's small Jewish community.

Panama's president-elect, Ernesto Perez Balladares, visiting Washington last week, said the crash "was not an accident, but a planted bomb inside the plane."

The day after the July 19 crash, thousands of the close-knit 7,000-member community turned out to bury their dead — and to worry over the motive that downed the commuter plane en route from Colon, a commercial free-trade center about 80 km from Panama City.

"Shock and fear have clearly set in," Mitchell Drimmer said.

Drimmer, a New York purchasing agent for department stores in Panama, has developed close ties with the Panamanian Jewish community over the years. He flew south as soon as he heard about the plane crash.

"You come for the weddings and bar mitzvahs," he said. "You have to come for the tragedies, too."

Because it occurred just one day after the devastating explosion that rocked the Jewish community's headquarters in Buenos Aires, many feared the Panama plane crash was yet another terrorist attack aimed at Jews.

However, speculation in the Jewish community and elsewhere in Panama has shifted to the belief that this "wasn't political, but drug-related," according to a source in the community who asked not to be named.

One of the victims, Saul Schwartz, reportedly was under investigation by Italian authorities for links to the Colombian-based Medellin cocaine cartel.

Last year, Schwartz, a gold dealer, was kidnapped and later released, according to Drimmer. A month ago, Schwartz's cousin allegedly attempted to assassinate him by attaching a hand grenade to the steering wheel of Saul Schwartz's car. The grenade went off and Schwartz was injured.

Fueling speculation that the plane bomb was motivated by drug-related crimes rather than anti-Semitism is the fact that there were "better" sites to bomb if Jews alone were the target, according to one source.

He cited Panama City's three synagogues, its Jewish community centre and even the next flight out of Colon, which would have carried more than 50 Jewish passengers.

Despite the widespread belief, as one source put it, that the explosion "has all the makings of a Colombian hit," Panama's Jews continue to feel uneasy over the incident.

"We will not sleep until we know if this is an act of anti-Semitic terror or drug-related narcotics terror," Drimmer quoted one community leader as saying.

Adding to speculation that the bombing was the action of a terrorist group, according to Drimmer, was the fact that one of the bodies found in the wreckage had been registered on the flight under an Arab name. So far, the body has not been claimed by any family or friends.

Drimmer also noted that a bullet hole had been found in the fuselage of the aircraft.

"We don't know what it means," he said, adding that it was still a question whether "the bullet was from the ground coming in or from the inside going out."

Drimmer noted that there were reports indicating that officials from Mossad, the Israeli intelligence service, were in Panama helping with the investigation. But officials with the Panamanian government and the Israeli embassy would not confirm the reports.

Panama's Jewish community, meanwhile, is doing its best to cope with the lack of hard answers.

Joseph Harari, chairman of the Latin American section of B'nai Brith International and an uncle of one of the victims, said, "First we wish to bury our dead. Then I think we will pressure the local authorities to take the appropriate action, and insist that they find" the cause.

Harari had, ironically, been asked by B'nai Brith officials to travel to Buenos Aires to represent the organization at a July 21 rally to protest the July 18 bombing, which killed dozens of people.

Regardless of the cause or motive, the downed Panamanian plane left families and friends in Panama's wealthy, influential and mostly observant community in deep mourning.

For Miriam Harouche, the crash signaled the end of her family as she had known it. She lost her husband, Mauricio, and her son, Isaac. Now her daughter-in-law intends to return to her native Colombia, taking her children with her.

"I've lost my husband and son, and soon I will lose my grandchildren," Harouche lamented.

The funerals for most of the Jewish victims were held late at night on July 20. At a mass funeral at the city's Sephardic cemetery, eight of the victims were buried in adjoining graves at the edge of the burial ground.

Two of the victims, Schwartz and Chaya Jaaker, were interred at the Ashkenazic cemetery.

The victims also included two Israelis. With its free-trade zone, Panama had apparently attracted hundreds of Israeli businesspeople. In fact, it was the Israelis who started the trend of flying, rather than driving, back and forth between Panama City and Colon.

German skinheads rampage

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BONN — Ignatz Bubis, head of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, has sharply criticized "the light hand" with which German authorities handled a group of skinheads, who on Saturday night rampaged through the former concentration camp of Buchenwald.

The 22 skinheads arrived at Buchenwald by bus from the nearby towns of Erfurt and Gera in the central German state of Thuringia. They soon started running wild through the camp, chanting Nazi slogans and throwing stones.

When one worker at the camp's memorial site tried to stop them, they threatened to burn her to death. No one was hurt in the rioting but several monuments were lightly damaged.

The worker managed to summon the police, who interrogated the group, and later released all but one.

Bubis said police released the suspects because, from the start, officials handled the case as merely a "disruption of public order."

He added that if police had handled the case as a "severe disruption of public order" — as it is phrased in German law books, or as one involving the use of Nazi slogans or threats of violence — all 22 suspects would have remained in custody.

Bubis charged that authorities were wrong to handle the case as the mere "foolishness of a few youngsters."

Israel sends aid to Rwandan refugees

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Israel dispatched a medical-aid team to the Zaire-Rwandan border Sunday night as part of the international effort to alleviate the Rwandan refugee crisis.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin decided on Friday to send eight Hercules aircraft, loaded with medical peronnel, food, water, antibiotics and a fully-equipped MASH (Mobile Army Surgical Hospital), which will include an operating room and intensive care unit.

The 77-member team, including reserve soldiers who agreed to the assignment on just a few hours' notice, will be headed by Environment Minister Yossi Sarid.

Chief IDF Medical Officer Brig.-Gen. Michael Weiner will oversee the deployment of the field hospital, to be set up near Goma, Zaire, not far from the Rwanda-Zaire border, Health Minister Ephraim Sneh said, adding that the request for the unit came from United Nations relief workers.

"We feel a need and obligation to help and do something. I am sure that this is the feeling of all Israeli citizens. So we are doing everything we can," Sarid told Israel Radio Saturday night.

"We are probably the last people in the world who can be indifferent in the face of such a disaster," he said.

German politician defends his views

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

DRESDEN, Germany — Steffen Heitmann claims he spoke for most Germans when he suggested that Germany should not be held hostage to the Holocaust.

Heitmann, the minister of justice in the eastern state of Saxony, was pressured to withdraw his candidacy for the German presidency late last year following comments he made in an interview with the Munich daily Suddeutsche Zeitung.

Touching off a political storm both in Germany and abroad, his statement underlined the extreme sensitivity with which the Holocaust is still viewed in this country, nearly 50 years after the destruction of the Third Reich.

"I believe that the organized deaths of millions of Jews in gas chambers was unique indeed — just as there are many historically-unique events," he told the newspaper. "History in any event does not repeat itself. But I do not believe that a special role for Germany should flow from this until the end of history. The postwar period finally ended with German unification, and the time has come to put this event in perspective."

Herbert Lappe, a Jewish community leader in Dresden, told The Canadian Jewish News that Heitmann's ruminations were ill-conceived because they coincided with the growth of neo-Nazism in Germany and, therefore, created a "social climate" for extremists.

Although Heitmann's remarks were widely condemned by politicians throughout Germany, they were conspicuously endorsed by the German People's Union, a far-right, anti-Semitic party.

In an interview in his office last month, Heitmann said he had no regrets. Nor, he noted, did he feel like a sacrificial lamb.

Yet he hastened to add that his remarks in the Suddeutsche Zeitung had been taken out of context and thus misinterpreted. As a result, he lamented, he was portrayed as "a monster" and "a racist."

A 49-year-old Protestant theologian with a knowledge of Hebrew, Heitmann insisted that, contrary to reports, Chancellor Helmut Kohl had not asked him to step aside. In fact, he did so voluntarily, in the interests of national unity. "A campaign was launched against me, and nothing positive could come out of it."

Heitmann said he could have been Germany's president today had he not withdrawn his candidacy.

Judging by the thousands of supportive letters he has received since then, Heitmann thinks that the majority of Germans share his opinions.

"I don't believe that most Germans are tired of hearing about the Holocaust," he said. "But they shouldn't be confronted with it. The Holocaust shouldn't be pushed aside, but there should be an open debate."

Every generation, he argued, has to work out its own view of history, "and that includes the Holocaust."

Forgetting is not a means of dealing with the past. But the fixing of "a certain postwar viewpoint is not possible."

Heitmann reiterated that the Holocaust — a "singular, unique event" — must "remain in our consciousness. The story of the Holocaust will always be a part of German history."

Steffen Heitmann

However, he pointed out, the Third Reich was but an episode, albeit horrible and catastrophic, in the long course of German history.

After the Holocaust, Germans want to get on with their lives. "The people of Europe — and the world — can do a lot to help us. It isn't good if Germans are compelled to live according to a special self-definition."

Heitmann, a member of Kohl's Christian Democratic Union party, said he does not have the impression that the Jewish community in Germany is exploiting the Holocust for its own ends.

Holocaust education in German schools, he declared, is "absolutely necessary."

Heitmann, who was 20 when he met a Jew for the first time, called for more meetings between Jews and Germans. "In this way, prejudice can be eliminated."

Turning to the upsurge of right-wing radicalism in Germany since unification in 1990, Heitmann maintained that the federal government is doing its best to combat neo-Nazi violence against foreigners, asylum-seekers and Jews.

In Saxony, the effort by police to crack down on neo-Nazi gangs has been particularly successful since the firebombing of a foreigners' hostel in the town of Hoyerswerda in 1991.

Heitmann said his father was a train guard during World War II, and died in captivity in the former Soviet Union.

Heitmann initially heard about the Holocaust from his grandfather, who, he said, was partially responsible for saving a half-Jewish friend from deportation to a concentration camp.

As a Protestant minister, Heitmann learned Hebrew, Latin and Greek. He can read Hebrew, but cannot converse in Hebrew.

He has never visited Israel, but hopes to do so in the future.

Rabbinical Reflections

By RABBI LEIGH LERNER

The central feature of this month of Av is its ninth day. The ninth of Av, Tisha b'Av is a day of mourning, an all-day fast and an affliction of body and soul.

Av's beginning, therefore, is sombre. The first days set the tone for Tisha b'Av, when the very traditional Jews will not wear leather shoes, will not eat, wil not study Torah, will not sit on a soft chair, not do things which remind them of happiness or rejoicing. The Book of Lamentations is read in the synagogue and many prayers of lamentation, called kinot, are offered.

A poll of contemporary Jews might discover that only a small percentage fasted or observed Tisha b'Av in the fullness of its practices. How did we come to observe the ninth of Av in the breach?

In the 19th century, Western European Jews wanted to become citizens of their countries. By being a citizen, a Jew could vote, hold office, attend university, could, in short, carry on a normal life outside the ghetto. Many Orthodox Jews adopted the idea of Torah Im Derekh Eretz, the Torah combined with an appreciation for the ways of the land where we live. This was an idea of Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch, a German traditionalist who urged his fellow Jews to take hold of Western culture, even as they remained observant of the traditional mitzvot.

Some Jews, on the other hand, felt that mourning for the fall of the Temple was no longer logical. They expected no return to Zion in the early 19th century. Instead, they felt that a world of freedom and human rights was as close as anyone could come to the messianic age. They simply rejected the idea that the Temples needed to be mourned, since a return to what was then the savage and wasted Land of Israel would not make them better off, but worse off, while remaining as full citizens in Berlin, Paris, London, and ultimately New York would improve their lot. So why mourn the Temple? Let it be a memorable part of the past.

Jews of Eastern Europe, on the other hand, faced extreme anti-Semitism. They had no hopes of citizenship in Poland and Russia. Millions left for North America, expressing their belief in human rights by heading for these shores. Tens of thousands believed that making aliyah to rebuild the national homeland in Palestine was the answer, and Zionism emerged in strength. Today the State of Israel exists. Its existence also calls into question the need for Tisha b'Av.

So now we have two reasons why Tisha b'Av is not so widely observed: most of us live in lands of freedom with no desire to reconstruct a sacrificial cult in Jerusalem. Millions live in the Land of Israel, considered by many to be the new Temple of Jewish existence. No wonder, then, that Tisha b'Av has lost some of its power to attract the Jewish soul. We are asked to mourn for what we do not believe is lost any longer. For many, the power of the day has waned.

There's another day in Av, a day of joy that is no longer observed, the 15th, the full moon of Av. It served as a matchmaking holiday, when unwed and eligible young maidens would go out dressed in white. All the girls borrowed clothes from each other so that no one looked as if she were poor. They danced together in the vineyards outside Jerusalem and called on the unwed boys to consider their virtues.

The 15th of Av is also forgotten. Once it was a day like Yom Kippur, a day of forgiveness of sin. Once it was a popular day for marriages, and of course, for matchmaking. We do not lament its passing. We live with it as a memory, but not as a day of deeds.

So its is possible for holidays in Judaism to come and go, wax and wane, based on need and on history. Perhaps the ninth of Av will continue to wane, and in its place, Yom Hashoah will gain. Perhaps the desperate need for Jews to find other Jews to marry will make Tu b'Av, the 15th of Av, a popular holiday again.

We Jews have renewed our faith time and again. In our own age we added Yom Hashoah and Yom Ha'atzmaut, Israel Independence Day.

Av brings testimony to the shifting power of Jewish holy days to shape our lives, and of our power to shape the holy days so that they might have meaning.

Rally held on Tisha b'Av to protest peace accord

Jewish Telgraphic Agency

NEW YORK — With shouts of "Rabin is a traitor" for punctuation, some 250 people marked the fast day of Tisha b'Av here with a rally for the unity of Jerusalem and, in large measure, against the government of the State of Israel.

In 86-degree heat, speakers on Sunday, July 17 connected the destruction of the temples in Jerusalem 19 and 25 centuries ago with the events in the wake of what Rabbi Simcha Krauss, an Orthodox rabbi from Queens, called "the terrible handshake of Sept. 13."

"We are witnessing the beginning of the betrayal by the government of Israel of Jerusalem, the holy city," said New York State Assemblyman Dov Hikind, a Democrat from Brooklyn.

Somber day

Activist Rabbi Avi Weiss, who was heckled for saying "I do not believe Rabin is a traitor," warned that reports concerning the possible internationalization of Jerusalem mean "a torch has been lit," threatening the city.

The somber day was accorded a hint of the festive, with balloons taped to street lamps proclaiming, "Shame on Rabin, Shame on Peres," colorful signs declaring "Jewish history is in Hebron, not Tel Aviv" and at least one button bearing a photograph of Dr. Baruch Goldstein, an Israeli settler who killed 29 Muslim worshippers earlier this year.

Sponsors of the rally included the Coalition for a Secure U.S.-Israel Friendship, Emunah Women of America, Jerusalem Reclamation Project, Jewish Action Alliance, National Council of Young Israel Rabbinical Alliance of America, Vaad Harabonim of Flatbush and Vaad Harabonim of Queens.

Also participating were Kahane Chai, the Jewish Defense League, and the Coalition for Jewish Concerns-Amcha.

Sinai archeological artifacts now on display in Israel

By MICHELE CHABIN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Just weeks after Israel captured the Sinai Peninsula from Egypt in 1967, Israeli archaeologists began a series of groundbreaking excavations that continued until the country's withdrawal from the area in 1982.

Digging in a region that had been virtually ignored by the international scientific community, the Israelis unearthed a wealth of artifacts and skeletons, many dating back over 5,000 years.

In a few months, Israel will return the last of these archeological treasures to Egypt, under the terms of the 1979 peace accord between the two countries.

To usher out the end of an era, the Israel Museum has launched the exhibit, "Sinai: A Farewell for Peace." Scheduled to close on Sept. 12, this exhibit marks the first — and possibly last — time that the Sinai artifacts will be displayed to the Israeli public.

Thanks to the region's dry climate, many of the finds are in remarkably good condition.

Foremost among these are hundreds of cloth and basketry fragments from the 14th century CE; painted funerary masks from the 4th-5th century BCE; and a group of "nawamis" — round stone structures that served as burial tombs. More than 5,000 years old, they are the oldest structures in the world to have survived with their roofs intact. Some of the structures contained the remains of entire families.

During a press tour of the exhibit prior to its opening in July, archaeologists recalled their "love affair" with Sinai and the unique discoveries made there.

Avner Goren, the archaeologist in charge of Sinai excavations for some 15 years, noted that the initial excavations were borne out of practical necessity.

When Israel gained control of the peninsula, it immediately began to build an infrastructure. "One of our main goals was to protect sites from being destroyed when roads were constructed," Goren said, "and another problem was curious tourists who explored half-exposed ruins. Truthfully, our work began as a salvation excavation."

At the time, Goren added, the Israeli excavators felt like pioneers. "Sinai was virtually unknown to archaeologists. Very few sites had been excavated. There was St. Catherine's Monastery and a few places, mostly along the main road."

During the archaeologists' 15 years in the Sinai, "we got to know the place and fall in love with it," Goren said. "It was a wilderness, but with a human touch. Bedouins live there. My children grew up among the Bedouins."

It was the Bedouins who helped the Israelis identify potential sites, Goren noted. "They are familiar with the area and helped us very much," he said.

Once a possible site had been identified, the archaeologists employed a number of high-tech research tools, including satellite mapping, to determine what lay beneath centuries' worth of soil and sand.

In all, the Israelis — most notably teams from Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, the Israel Antiquities Department and Tel Aviv University — excavated about 19 sites throughout Sinai.

Asked whether he and his colleagues feel some regret handing over the artifacts to the Egyptians, Goren replied, "I do, of course, have a personal attachment to these things, but you must remember that even if they stayed in Israel, I would not keep them in my home. They belong in a museum.

"When you find things, you want them to contribute to a bank of knowledge. When we were in Sinai, we had a small museum at St. Catherine's," he said.

"In a way, these things are going back to their rightful place," Goren added. "They belong to Egypt, and we were aware of it all along. We were working in Sinai like foreign archaeologists work here. Ultimately, the finds belong to the country being excavated."

In Israel to attend the exhibit's opening, Mohammed Abdul, general director of Sinai excavations for the Egyptian Antiquities Authority, stressed that the upcoming transfer is an outgrowth of the peaceful, cooperative relations that exist between Israel and Egypt.

Standing next to Goren, Abdul said, "We are not here only to take the objects, but to celebrate the opening with our dear friends and colleagues."

Before the Israelis had come to Sinai, Abdul said, "excavating in the area was completely zero." At present, teams of archaeologists from Egypt, France, Greece, the United States and Canada are working at more than 20 sites, most of them in northern Sinai.

He was quick to point out that many of the excavations currently under way were started by Israeli teams more than a decade ago. "These missions are possible because our colleagues here started a very good project," Abdul said.

Now that the peace treaty has been fulfilled, Goren and Abdul said they looked forward to the day — perhaps within a year or two — when Israeli archaeologists will be welcome to dig alongside their Egyptian counterparts .

"There is still a lot of research to be done," said Goren wistfully. "I hope, very much, that I will be able to go back to Sinai and work there."

Cities similar in name sow confusion

By CARL ALPERT

Mysteries are to be found in literature, in police and crime files and in television quiz programs. But Israel also has an unusual mystery in the form of two new cities which are now on the planning boards and are to be erected shortly. Both cities are to bear the same name — Irron.

Earlier this year, the minister of Construction and Housing, Binyamin Ben-Eliezer, announced that a new metropolis with a projected population of 250,000 was to rise in the Menashe hills, southeast of Haifa.

Some 7,500 acres of rocky land, unsuitable for agriculture, had been set aside for the city. It was intended to provide suburban homes for thousands of people who would be employed in Haifa or Hadera or other nearby centres; yet the new Irron would also have an industrial park of its own.

Strategically, the city is part of a master plan to set up a continuous chain of Jewish centres running down the length of the country, away from the sea, well within the Green Line, and parallel to the already thickly populated coastal strip.

There was a hint that, when Jewish settlers began to vacate their settlements in Judea and Samaria, they would find quality housing in Irron. Access would be via the new national superhighway now in the planning, which will run north and south, also away from the coast, and bypassing all towns.

The announcements were filled with optimism, but the precise location of the city was not clear, and some reports were conflicting. At any rate, the public was told that the town planning department of the ministry was already at work on the project. If final government approval is obtained, the cornerstone could be laid in two years.

Name of the new city: Irron, or Eiron.

Several months ago, four busloads of Jewish journalists from all parts of the world, who had been attending a conference in Jerusalem, were taken for a visit to a projected new city to be built in the centre of the country — in Wadi Arrah, where there is a large Arab population. At the moment some 86,000 Arabs and perhaps 10,000 Jews live in the area.

The purpose of the project is to bring about a closer, more friendly relationship between Jews and Arabs as neighbors, or so it was explained to the journalists who were taken to the site. Sponsors of the program? The department for rural and urban development of the Jewish Agency. And the name of the city — Irron or Eiron, depending on how the transliteration from the Hebrew is to be spelled.

Jewish Agency speakers described how the city is to be geographically interwoven among the existing Arab villages, allowing the latter independent status, yet making them obviously economically dependent on the services and facilities of the large city, their neighbor.

The program of the conference (sponsored by the Jewish Agency) was even more explicit, calling for a visit to the "site of the new Arab-Jewish town," with explanations by both Jewish Agency and local Arab officials.

Literature distributed among the journalists on the spot noted existing barriers to development, among them imbalance in the demographic situation and lack of communication between the Jewish and Arab sector, as well as the poor image of the area, which acts as a deterrent for new Jewish settlers, especially for security reasons.

Among the many objectives of the program as listed were the encouraging of joint business ventures and the fostering of a centre for Jewish-Arab dialogue. It was interesting to note that among the literature distributed was a leaflet promoting Givat Haviva's Centre for Jewish-Arab Relations, which happens to be located nearby and is supported by, among others, the New Israel Fund and the Kibbutz Artzi (Hashomer Hatzair).

The mystery: Is the Irron being planned by the Ministry of Construction and Housing the same as the Irron being planned by the Jewish Agency? If so, why do they sound so different, depending on who is providing the information?

We sought clarification. The Jewish Agency had already given us their side of the story. Yet despite repeated queries to the Ministry of Housing, the spokesperson of the ministry failed to answer any of our questions.

Problem of 1948 refugees yet to be addressed

By ABRAHAM RABINOVICH
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

At Jerusalem's Ulpan Beit Ha'am, where we studied Hebrew together in the summer of 1967, Ziad Abu Zayyad was by far the best student in the class. When the teacher was summoned away, the Jewish students by acclamation would call on Zayyad, a young lawyer from east Jerusalem, to take over the class.

He not only learned Hebrew but also came to understand the Hebrews. Last month, when he appeared on the popular Israeli television talk show Popolitika, it was not to debate the issues of the day as a PLO official, but to address a primal Israeli concern — the Palestinian demand for the "right of return" to the pre-1967 boundaries of Israel.

Zayyad, who heads the PLO delegation to the negotiations on regional security in the current peace talks, attempted to deliver a startling message to the Israeli public, but in the anarchical atmosphere of the television program it went virtually unnoticed.

The Palestinians understand that Israel cannot accept the mass return of refugees to the pre-1967 borders, he said, and therefore are willing to consider financial compensation instead. None of the Israeli participants in the program seemed to hear him.

In an interview last week, Zayyad elaborated on his remark. He said his comment reflected a view widely held in the PLO leadership. "In principle, the refugees of 1948 have the right to return to their homes and lands inside the green line.

"They were driven out of their homes, if not by physical pressure, then by psychological pressure. As civilians they have the right to leave a battlefield and the right to come back when the fighting stops.

"However, it seems obvious that the implementation of this right would be very difficult, if not impossible, because Israel is concerned about protecting its Jewish majority.

"It can be expected that Israel will not allow the return of these refugees because this would endanger its Jewish character and turn it into a binational state, which is something Israel would not accept."

The question of the 1948 refugees, Zayyad says, should be addressed within the framework of Security Council Resolution 194 which calls for resolving the problem by allowing the refugees back or paying them compensation.

"Many of these refugees are economically and socially well off where they are now and would prefer to stay there rather than become refugees again in their own homeland," Zayyad says. "Their situation will be, it seems to me, like that of the Jews in the world who choose to stay where they are but still support the idea of the Jewish State."

Many of the Palestinians inhabiting refugee camps in southern Lebanon, Syria and Jordan would not readily abandon their dream of returning to their former homes, he acknowledges. How, then, would he attempt to persuade them to accept compensation?

"There will not be a need to persuade," Zayyad says. "This will be a national compromise."

The level of compensation would, however, be an important factor in reconciling the 1948 refugees to life elsewhere, he says.

"If a refugee in a camp would be given enough compensation to start a new life with dignity and economic stability, maybe he won't need convincing."

Would Syria, Lebanon and Jordan agree to Palestinian refugees settling permanently in their countries?

"This would be part of an overall settlement and must be discussed by a committee made up of all the countries involved."

Some PLO officials put the number of 1948 refugees and their offspring today at four million, while Israeli officials talk of two to three million. The 1988 UN figure for refugees in camps in the territories and surrounding Arab countries was 2.3 million.

Zayyad makes a clear distinction between the 1948 refugees and those who fled during and immediately after the Six Day War. The latter, he says, must be permitted to return to the territories. But not immediately.

"About 300,000 left in 1967. Today their number is 700,000-800,000. If they were allowed to return at one time they would constitute a burden on the Palestinian national authority. But they should be allowed to return to the West Bank and Gaza during the transitional period ... They will not constitute a demographic threat to the Jews."

A third group which should be permitted to return immediately, he says, are the 17,000 - 18,000 persons who left the territories with Israeli permits but failed to return before their permits expired.

The main problem, however, remains the mass of 1948 refugees whose dreams of returning to places such as Jaffa and Lod constitute for Israel an existential threat. "If we negotiate in good faith, I am pretty sure we can reach a civilized solution," says Zayyad. "I have spoken with many leaders of the PLO and they share my views."

And Yasser Arafat?

"My impression is that he does not belong to the minority in this regard."

Zayyad objects to any attempt to offset Palestinian claims for compensation with counterclaims concerning property abandoned by Jews who left Arab countries for Israel. "We, the Palestinians, did not force them to leave those countries. Therefore the issue should be negotiated directly with the Arab countries those refugees came from."

For seven years he published a Hebrew-language newspaper, Gesher (Bridge), aimed at presenting Palestinian views to Israelis. More than most Palestinian leaders, he is aware of the Israeli mindset and the sense of existential threat that lurks behind the country's imposing defense establishment.

Israeli Arabists believe that Zayyad's remarks constitute a trial balloon worth noting.

"It is a signal from the pragmatic wing of the Palestinians to the Israeli public that the PLO will not cross red lines," says Dr. Ifrah Zilberman of the Hebrew University. "It is also part of a process of preparing the Palestinian public, because these sorts of statements are translated back by the Arabic media. I think what he said was important."

Terrorism unleashed

The recent explosion at the offices of the DAIA, the Argentine Jewish community umbrella organization, shows that when Arab apologists make a distinction between Jews and Zionists, it is a distinction without a difference.

This terrorist act, along with the bombing of the World Trade Centre in New York City, also shows that Arab extremists are ready to victimize and murder not only Jews but anyone who happens to be in the way of their gruesome plans.

The tragedy in Buenos Aires, however, has a special poignancy about it. At this writing, 34 people are said to have died in the explosion; 150 more were injured by the blast. When the debris is finally cleared, it is feared that dozens more bodies will be extricated from the demolished building.

The perpetrators destroyed more than human life.

The DAIA building housed not only the business offices of the organization, a theatre and an art gallery, but also a huge library which contained archives dealing with Argentine Jewish history and files pertaining to the Nazi war criminals who entered Argentina (with the connivance of certain circles within the Vatican and the tacit permission of the government of the day) after World War II.

Much of the documentation on the Jewish history of Argentina was in Yiddish, the second language of the Ashkenazi Jews of the country. Those archives were a priceless depository of information about the Jewish immigrants who came to Argentina from the 1860s on, and who contributed so much to their new country's cattle industry and its manufacturing sectors.

It undoubtedly contained a wealth of information about the Jewish gauchos, the Argentine cowboys who worked in the cattle industry, and about the Jewish tailors, shoemakers and small tradesmen who contributed so much to the infrastructure of Argentina's economy.

If the terrorist bombers thought they would stop the peace talks through their violence, the steps which Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres took recently on Jordanian territory to initiate the new round of negotiations with Jordan's King Hussein gave the lie to those suppositions. The peace talks will continue and a modus vivendi between Israel and her Arab neighbors will be achieved.

Meanwhile, Jews everywhere must now redouble their efforts to ensure the safety and security of community buildings, including those in Montreal, Toronto, and every other city and community in Canada.

A moment of light

Far too many Germans embraced National Socialism and exulted in it. This is a fact, as well as an historic burden. But, as the film Schindler's List showed, there was opposition to Hitler's odious regime. Unfortunately, all attempts to overthrow his totalitarian government misfired or were mercilessly crushed.

The most ambitious and carefully planned effort to rid Germany of this blot on its civilization was undertaken 50 years ago on July 20. Gen. Klaus Naumann, chief of staff of the German armed forces, has described it as "a moment of light in a very dark period of German history." That it failed was a tragedy — not only for Germany but for tens of millions of Europeans, including Jews, under the yoke of the Nazi occupation.

The 50th anniversary of the plot to assassinate Hitler was marked last week by a ceremony in Berlin presided over by Chancellor Helmut Kohl. To shed further light on this event, the German Defence Ministry is sending an exhibition to the United States and France which also focuses attention on the groups, small though they were, whose objective was to eliminate the Nazi clique and return Germany to sanity.

The story of their heroic efforts is told in a new series of books translated from the original German and published by Westview Press in Boulder, Colorado. Entitled Dissent and Resistance in the Third Reich, these heretofore out-of-print volumes are among the most important works on the German resistance movement ever published. The titles are The Secret War Against Hitler by Fabian von Schlabrendorff; The Von Hassell Diaries by Ulrich von Hassell; The Flame of Freedom by Eberhard Zeller; and Conscience in Revolt by Annedore Leber.

These books not only pay tribute to decent and courageous German like Count Claus Schenk von Stauffenberg, Karl Friedrich Goerdeler, Sophie Scholl, Dietrich Bonhoeffer and Count Helmuth James von Moltke. They also underscore the fact that contemporary Germany, its neo-Nazi fringe notwithstanding, is trying to live up to the democratic ideals espoused by the doomed anti-Nazi resistance movement.

GYPSY FARMERS

Re: "Germany remembers the murdered Gypsies" by Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut (CJN, July 7)

Having read Rabbi Plaut's interesting article, I would like to comment on his statement that Gypsies "were occasionally semi-settled (but) they never became farmers."

When I had been deported to a forced labor camp at the "Atlantic Wall" in Normandy, in German-occupied France, there were close to 100 Gypsy fellow-prisoners. Their families had been settled as farmers in East Prussia for about three generations. The Nazis had expropriated all and sterilized the males. Some of the inmates were in their 60s.

OPENING MEMORY'S DOOR

I am writing to thank you for publishing the article, "Transnistria, the forgotten cemetery" by Felicia Carmelly (June 23).

When I was old enough to start asking such questions, I used to ask my mother why I had no grandparents. She told me that her parents and her brother had died in the war. But she didn't know when, she didn't know where, and she didn't know how. She had heard vague stories that they had died, probably of starvation, in a place called Transnistria. And that's all she could tell me. She observes yahrzeit for her whole family on the day that an uncle of hers died.

When I learned more about the Holocaust I learned about places like Auschwitz, Bergen-Belsen, and Sobibor. But I never heard anything about this place Transnistria, and when I asked about it I usually received only blank looks.

My mother, who lives in Montreal, became very excited when she read the article in The CJN. I obtained the book, Jagendorf's Foundry that had been mentioned in the article, and sent it to her. I was pleased that finally, after more than 50 years, she (and I) may finally learn a little more about what had happened to her family. On her behalf, and mine, I thank you.

TRANSNISTRIA RESPONSE

Re: "Transnistria, at the forgotten cemetery," (June 23)

Between June 23 and July 8, I received 42 calls about the above article.

A group of Transnistria survivors from Toronto will be meeting later this summer. Some of the participants will be speaking in order to raise community awareness of the many Transnistria concentration, labor and death camps.

There might be a possibility of organizing a similar group in Montreal. There are many more Transnistria survivors there.

I apologize to the readers for the inconvenience resulting from omitting the area code for my phone number in Toronto, (416) 482-1813.

SEEKS NORMAN WALDEN

I am attempting to find Norman Walden, born around 1918 (or his descendants) son of Bertha and Harry Walden, and great grandson of Abraham Walkerwich. He is first cousin to Jack Hartstein, the great-nephew of the late Sarah Walkerwich (wife of Harris Herman) from London, England, and was last known to be living in Montreal. He had an aunt in Westcliffe, England and had a business connection with Coleman-Rickets.

REACHING OUT TO JEWS

It was with considerable concern that I read the short piece written by a young Jewish woman regarding her difficulties in connecting with the Jewish community since coming to Toronto and her resulting fear of assimilation. Her message raises the issue of who should take responsibility for helping a fellow Jew, be it a newcomer, a native Torontonian, or a disabled person.

Responsibility is a two-way street, requiring the community to make every effort to reach out to all, especially newcomers, and the individual to make the best of their circumstances within the community. The latter is an issue which only the author can grapple with. Regarding the former, it has been my experience as a non-native to Toronto that indeed there are many kind and warm members of the community willing to extend a hand. In addition, there are a number of outreach organizations and families only too willing to reach out and help.

However, the contention that there is a lack of reaching out collectively and on an institutional basis should not be dismissed; rather it bears careful examination. After all, if our institutions were doing their job, why this plea, one which I have heard from numerous married and single people in Toronto?

The challenge is for all of us to make that extra effort to make all Jews in Toronto feel part of one large family, klal Yisrael.

Toronto has become the largest and most dynamic community in Canada in recent years. As such, this requires taking the responsibility of leadership. Today's leadership requirements, however, entail more than simply maintaining the physical institutions or organizing effective fundraising. It means caring and helping our people re-connect spiritually and emotionally, both with themselves as Jews and with the broader community.

TO UNDERSTAND JUDAISM

The issue of Jewish Continuity was dealt with in your editorial of July 7, and in an article by Barbara Silverstein in the same edition. The community leadership has determined that Jewish Continuity is no longer a given, and together with Jewish parents, is searching for ways to inspire young Jews to be proud of their heritage.

But, as Ms. Silverstein notes, it is virutally impossible to inspire our children when we ourselves are uncomfortable with aspects of Judaism which we feel to be tribalistic, archaic or sexist. As a student of Judaism, I have found that these criticisms are largely the result of a superficial knowledge of what the Jewish religion truly stands for.

The best way to ensure Jewish Continuity is for us to educate ourselves. Our own understanding and pride in our heritage will spill over to our children far more effectively than any after-school class ever can.

I personally know some talented rabbis and teachers who can introduce people like the Silversteins to a deeper understanding of Judaism, for instance Yisroel Idels, JEP/Ohr Somayach, (416) 785-5899.

Imagine Shylock in a Tel Aviv theatre

By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

The Merchant of Venice has a bad reputation amongst Jews. Though by all accounts it is Shakespeare's most often staged play, there are many who believe that the Jewish caricature called Shylock plays a significant role in this popularity.

I hardly need to remind readers of the cultural stereotype which Shakespeare used and which he has helped to spread: the Jew as a usurer, who wants not only money from his debtor, but also a pound of flesh in case the debt is not paid.

For several hundred years that is precisely how Shylock was portrayed, and he, rather than Antonio (who gives the play its title), becomes the memorable character — this despite the fact that Shylock appears in only a few scenes. Yet it is precisely his figure that has made the drama famous and that makes Jewish communities highly uncomfortable when it plays in a prominent theatre in town.

Readers will also remember the unfortunate event which took place in Waterloo a few years ago when non-Jewish students began to harass their Jewish classmates after they had "studied" the play in school. "The money-grabbing, blood-thirsty Jew" is still a part of the stereotypical landscape.

Therefore, would one not suppose that the least likely place for the production of The Merchant would be a Tel Aviv theatre? Yet this play is being staged at the very moment I write. One of Israel's best known actors, Yossi Graber, is playing the role of Shylock at Tel Aviv's Municipal Cameri Theatre.

I was intrigued to read about this in a review of the play by Calev Ben-David, which appeared in the June 16 edition of the Jerusalem Report.

Rabbi Plaut

The Tel Aviv production follows the example of earlier attempts to shift the attention from Shylock to the gentile characters and their misbegotten prejudices and deceits. John Gross, in his book on Shylock, writes that "the most effective way of making the play acceptable to post-Holocaust sensibilities is to underscore the prejudices of the Christian characters, and generally show them in an ugly light."

This is what the Cameri play has done (the characters speak Hebrew, but hearers can rent earphones with simultaneous English translation). The director is Omri Nitzan, who last year staged another Shakespeare play in an unusual format, when he presented a wheelchair-bound Richard III.

Shylock is dressed in a conservative grey suit with a small black yarmulke discretely hidden under his homburg, and is portrayed as a smooth businessman eager to be accepted by gentile society. After he loses his daughter to conversion, he rips his collar as a sign of Jewish mourning and returns to his Jewish roots, reappearing bearded and dressed in a prayer shawl and big white yarmulke.

Reviewer Ben-David compares this Shylock to people like Ivan Boesky or Michael Milken, big-time American financiers who ran afoul of the law and who in jail returned to their Jewish religious origins.

In the end, Shylock — forced at knife point to convert — remains what he is and proudly so, despite it all. "Shylock is my name," he says and for the viewers he is victim and avenger rather than villain.

Something like this kind of Merchant has been previously produced by Jonathan Miller and others, but never quite so pointedly. The victim-turned-avenger will always be a powerful metaphor.

Volunteer program helps Israeli Arab community

By JUDITH SUDILOVSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

Sarah Clark, 18, is technically an English teacher.

But she's more than a teacher for her students at the Hadji High School for Girls in Umm el-Fahm, an Israeli-Arab village in the Galilee.

"I feel as if I'm on the same level as my students. We are more like friends," said Clark, who came from Norwich, England, for six months as a GAP teaching volunteer with 17 others.

Mohammed Qinwan, 15, a ninth-grade student at Razi Junior High School in Umm el-Fahm, where some of the teenage volunteers teach, says they definitely have had an influence. He is enthusiastic about the English language and during a telephone interview he spews forth a constant and fluent stream of synonyms.

Is he reading from a dictionary? Yes, he says, he likes the dictionary.

"I think the volunteers have the capacity, the ability to help us learn, help us improve our expression," said Qinwan. "They give us the freedom to express our emotions, our traditions. I'm improving my speech. The volunteer gives me help to develop. She gives us much inducement and is very enthusiastic."

His English has improved, he said, but it had been good to begin with.

This is the second year that teenage GAP volunteers have worked as teaching assistants in English classes in Israeli Arab schools. This month they will be finishing their volunteer assignments.

GAP, now in its 24th year, is a volunteer program for high-school graduates who want to take a year off before they start university. They go overseas and teach English, work in hospitals or do agricultural work. Some 750 volunteers are placed in 30 countries. The name GAP stands for the gap year the volunteers take before entering university.

The volunteers, who arrived in Israel in January, are teaching at the Haifa Arab Teacher Training College, and in schools in Umm el-Fahm, Sakhnin and Fassuta in Galilee, and in the Beduin villages of Aroer and Segev Shalom.

The local council is asked to provide housing, board and a bit of pocket money to the volunteers. Because in many places it is easier to find housing for young women, most of the volunteers are female.

"I like this idea of bringing students from abroad," said Ghada Abu Saleh, 20, in fluent English. A third-year student at the Haifa Arab Teacher Training College, she is from the Druze village of Majdal Shams in the Golan. "We benefit from their pronunciation. We learn many things about their culture . . . And they are also our friends and it is good to have friends from other backgrounds."

Saeed Ebgaria, the counselor for four volunteers in Umm el-Fahm, said he has seen improvement in pupils' English conversation skills, but noted volunteers often run into trouble when they need to explain grammar.

"Maybe it would be better if the volunteers were two or three years older," Ebgaria said, "but we still very much want them to be here."

No studies have been done on the program's impact, but Education Ministry inspector Wajeeh Awad sees only good coming from the program.

Arab students living in villages don't have the same exposure to English speakers as students in cities, he said, and having the volunteers living in the villages gives students and local teachers the chance to practise conversational English.

"The Arab students' only contact with the language outside school is through the television and that . . . is only passive exposure," he said. "Now with the volunteers, they have the opportunity to use their English . . . This will help them do better on the oral part of their matriculation exams."

Most of this year's GAP volunteers knew little or nothing about Israel before arriving.

Ever since Polly Osborn, 18, read Leon Uris's Exodus six years ago, she has wanted to visit. The Oxford resident has found that it is not quite like the kibbutz life depicted in the book.

"As a whole, I find Israel very exciting and stimulating, and the politics are very challenging. But I don't find myself pro-anything," said Osborn, who is teaching at the Haifa Arab Teacher Training College. "I'll have to come again to see the Jewish side."

"The only news I hear about is from friends in town, since we don't have a television," added Londoner Andy Ross, 18, who teaches at the Wadi Alnsoor Junior High School in Umm el-Fahm. "So we get a rather biased, one-sided view. I don't like to talk about my opinions, but it seems that, in general, the Muslims get misrepresented in the West through the media. They make all Muslims seem like fanatics. I'm trying to learn more about Islam."

The majority of the volunteers have had little opportunity to get to know Jewish Israelis, but would like to meet some.

The teaching program is coordinated by the British Council. The British Olim Society is responsible for the volunteer programs at kibbutzim and hospitals. GAP is funded by donations; volunteers must provide some of their own funds.

"At first we were worried that the teaching volunteers wouldn't be able to do what was expected of them," said Peter Sandiford, the British Council's Israel director. "But the proof is in the pudding. All the places which had them last year asked for more volunteers this year, and we also added a few new locations."

Next year, GAP will also be sending volunteers to development towns, mainly in the South, said Malcolm Johnson, British Council educational officer. But because of the time needed to recruit and screen volunteers, they probably won't be able to provide a large number of volunteers until the following school year, he said.

Before they were sent to their assignments, the volunteers were given one week of training in teaching English as a second language and then got a two-day introduction to Israel, along with a crash course in teaching English as a second language at Beit Berl in Kfar Sava.

The teaching methods here are similar to those in England and include group work and activities instead of just frontal teaching, said Sarah Clark.

Clark and Ross share a house with two other GAP volunteers - one woman and one man - although there are some people in Umm el-Fahm who don't approve of those living arrangements.

The two women have to be more careful about how they present themselves to the community. At first, they would meet with local youths, which was not acceptable to the villagers. Now, after Ebgaria persuaded the local council not to eject them, the young women are not calling on young men. "Here in Umm el-Fahm they have to understand there are limits," Ebgaria said.

One of last year's volunteers warned in a letter to Helen Harris not to teach in Segev Shalom if she was very feminist, but the 19-year-old from Worcestershire said she doesn't feel "too constricted."

She and fellow volunteer Irene Lambeth, 19, of Hampshire, live with a Bedouin family. While the Bedouin women are not free to go out in the evening or to sit with men, the community doesn't expect them, as Western women, to behave the same way, said Harris.

They have, however, felt frustrated in their role as teachers because of the low level of English knowledge in the schools, said Harris. She would have liked to receive more information about the Bedouin before coming so she would have known what to expect, she said. "They are given a tremendous amount of information on what to wear and how to behave - the British Council puts out a 20-page pamphlet - but still they are surprised when they come here," replied Sandiford. "After all, they are 18 years old and some have never been outside Britain. Going to live in a Bedouin village is quite a culture shock."

When a child gets hurt

By ERICA MEYER RAUZIN

My oldest daughter tends to get excited. When small things go wrong — a stubbed toe, a ruined dinner, a missed play date — she gets very upset, in true pre-teen fashion. Slammed doors. Yelled invectives. Dramatic scenes. Fun stuff.

None of it ever lasts very long, and she's such a good kid most of the time that we manage the flare-ups. But I did worry about what would happen, how she would handle it, if she had a real problem, as opposed to a minor glitch.

Then came the phone call from the school office the Monday of her last week of classes, the week that was to conclude with her long-anticipated journey to summer camp.

"Mrs. Rauzin, you'd better come to get your daughter. She hurt her arm."

I drove to school not quite knowing what to expect, and was greeted by my child, who was unnaturally calm.

"Mommy, look," she said.

I looked. She was holding her right forearm in her left hand and it didn't look so good.

'How do you feel, honey?" I asked her.

"Well," she said slowly, "it doesn't hurt too bad."

That's when I knew we were in trouble. If she'd been bruised, or had gotten a sprain, she would have been sobbing and distraught. This wan stoicism was scary, and so was her arm, which was cocked, crooked, bent part way between the wrist and the elbow, where arms are not supposed to bend.

Within a half-hour, she was X-rayed, her arm was reset, and she was fitted with a shoulder to finger-base cast. She had broken the radius, one of the two thin bones in the lower arm. It is a wonder she didn't break both of them.

Erica Meyer Rauzin

The whole time the doctor worked, she never shed a tear or complained about pain. She fretted about maybe missing camp, but she didn't whine. It was as if she had grown up in the second it took for the arm to break, the second she fell during the dash from second base to third base in a PE kickball game.

We went home with the cast and the sling, more than a thousand dollars poorer (and gasping from the fiscal blow). What if we hadn't been able to stomach-punch our savings account, what then, with a child hurt? There's the American health care funding issue on a gut level. The day after the arm injury, we filled out paperwork to drop our private insurance and join a different health plan.

Anyway, when we got home, we dealt with the issue of camp. The doctor had said to give the arm a few days and he'd X-ray it again on Friday. Not only was my injured daughter apprehensive, her little sister was a mess. My middle child, almost 8, had already been a little nervous about going to the farm camp with her big sister. The idea of going alone was extremely daunting.

After four days of jitters from both my girls, we took the second X-ray. The arm was healing beautifully. The doctor overwrapped the plaster cast with protective fibreglass and gave our injured soldier permission to go to camp. She can't get the cast wet or do anything that might lead to a fall, but that's much better than missing the whole show.

And in her camp trunk, sealed in a thick envelope, is a thin gray X-ray of a child's small arm and a note from the doctor with the names of two orthopedists in a nearby college town. I hope she won't even have to think about them. And if she can be calm, so can I.

This morning on the local news radio station, the overly-dramatic announcer described a school bus fender-bender in which no one was seriously injured as "a parent's worst nightmare."

Not even close.

And neither, thank heaven, is a broken arm.

Jewish angst in Germany

Reporting from Berlin, Bonn and Frankfurt, Sheldon Kirshner assesses the status of Jews in Germany today. This is the first of a series on Germany.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

"Has Germany once again become a dangerous place for Jews to live?"

This provocative question is starkly posed in the opening paragraph of a recent Jewish Telegraphic Agency dispatch from Bonn.

The story suggests that many Jews are "scared" by the upsurge of neo-Nazi-inspired xenonophobic violence and anti-Semitism that has erupted since the unification of Germany nearly four years ago.

There is no denying that attacks against foreigners, asylum seekers and Jews have caused angst. A survey released late last year showed that one-third of Germany's registered 43,000 Jews feel threatened by the rising tide of anti-Semitism, which has been steadily on the increase since 1992.

Addressing a conference near Bonn last month, Germany's interior minister, Manfred Kanther, acknowledged that anti-Semitic crimes have risen from 562 in 1992 to 656 in 1993.

Such assaults, capped by the fire-bombing of a synagogue in Lubeck last March, the first act of its kind since the Third Reich, pale in comparison to the number of attacks against foreigners and asylum-seekers.

And while Jewish leaders here are troubled by these outbreaks, and occasionally wonder whether the government is as zealous as it should be in trying to control and contain the small but vocal neo-Nazi movement, they are confident that the Jewish community is not in jeopardy.

Ignatz Bubis, chairman of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, is anything but smug.

A Holocaust survivor, he has expressed concern about the apparent discrepancy between Germany's treatment of the radical left and the extreme right, claiming that the police and courts have been far more lenient toward the right than the left.

He has also charged that anti-Semitism has ceased to be a taboo in post-war Germany, and that Jews are becoming increasingly worried about again being regarded as foreigners here.

Nevertheless, Bubis — a vocal and widely respected figure in this nation of 80 million — is sanguine. "I have faith in German democracy," he observed in an interview, noting that the number of right-wing extremist offences in 1993 declined by 15 percent over 1992.

And Bubis, who recently announced that he will not stand for re-election when his term expires in 1995, rejects comparisons between modern Germany and the ill-fated Weimar republic, which gave way to the long night of National Socialism.

Germany, he argued, is committed to democratic principles. It is an integral member of the Western alliance. It is no longer politically polarized, as was the case on the eve of Hitler's accession to power in 1933. At the polls, most Germans snub parties that appeal to base nationalism. And, in a series of nation-wide candle-lit demonstrations in reaction to neo-Nazi outrages in Hoyerswerda, Rostock, Molln and Solingen, Germans by the tens of thousands have carried the placards of tolerance.

Bubis cautions that neo-Nazis are capable of inflicting still more damage and anguish. But he hastens to add that they do not pose "a problem" for the Jewish community, and that Germany has "very strong" legislation to deal with racism in all its ugly forms.

Ignatz Bubis [Sheldon Kirshner]

Under German law, for example, the publication of anti-Jewish propaganda is strictly prohibited. Yet such literature makes its way to Germany via Canada, the United States, Britain and Sweden, among other countries.

Jerzy Kanal, the new chair of the Berlin Jewish community, the largest in Germany, dismisses neo-Nazi thugs as a numerically insignificant and uninfluential minority. But he fears that anti-Semitic populism, however artfully disguised, has become a "pillar" of the far right, particularly in the ranks of the Republican party, led by Franz Schonhuber, a former SS Wafen volunteer.

Furthermore, Kanal — a "graduate" of the Warsaw ghetto and the Auschwitz and Buchenwald concentration camps — is worried that anti-Semitism has surfaced as an "open" phenomenon.

Although Kanal doubts whether the government is "blind in its right eye," he charges that Chancellor Helmut Kohl did nothing to combat right-wing radicalism from 1990 to 1992.

Stefan Szajak, director of Frankfurt's Jewish community, does not minimize the cemetery desecrations and all the other manifestations of blatant anti-Semitism. "I don't want to underplay what is happening, but in this climate every swastika (painted or scrawled) on a wall is seized upon by the media."

He added, "Anti-Semitism here is not more serious than in France or the United States."

The big difference, of course, is that the Holocaust was conceived and planned in Germany by Germans. This colors any and all discussions about anti-Semitism, racism and xenophobia.

Still, Szajak, whose parents are survivors, hotly disputes the view, prevalent in some Diaspora circles, that dangers lurk for Jews in Germany. "This is absolutely exaggerated."

True, the Frankfurt community building is well secured and guarded by two uniformed policemen sitting in a van. But such precautions are and have been common in Germany and elsewhere in Europe for years now.

Despite the alarming statistics with regard to anti-Semitic-motivated crimes in Germany, Szajak contends that such vandalism has not increased in Frankfurt in the past couple of years.

With a wan smile, he shrugs off a report in the Anglo-Jewish press that the Jewish Agency of Israel has launched a comprehensive program to encourage emigration from Germany.

"That's why they're in business," he said. "They have to find new marketing techniques to encourage aliyah."

According to Szajak, "very, very few" Jews wish to leave Germany. Indeed, some 68,000 Jews from the former Soviet Union have applied for permission to settle in Germany.

In short, Szajak is confident of the community's future, though he is the first to admit that it's utterly dependent on imported teachers, rabbis, cantors and other professionals to service its network of schools, synagogues and social welfare agencies.

As for anti-Semitism, Szajak is of the considered opinion that it poses no real threat to the community's viablity — assuming that government institutions hew to democratic values.

Mordechai Lewy, Israel's outgoing consul-general in Berlin and soon-to-be ambassador to Thailand, has been a keen observer of the scene since 1991.

Right-wing extremism, though worrisome, does not threaten Jewish interests, he said. "Anti-Semitism is more open, but whether there are more anti-Semites is debatable."

In the past, he elaborated, the government did not always respond with due vigor to xenophobic mayhem. Today, the situation is quite different.

Anita Kugler, a reporter who specializes in Jewish issues for the left-of-centre Berlin daily Die Tageszeitung, believes that Germany is doing its utmost "to protect Jews and Jewish life."

As she said: "Nothing is more provocative to mainstream German politicians than physical attacks on Jewish property and institutions."

Kugler noted that right-wing radicalism, especially its neo-Nazi variant, tarnishes Germany's international reputation and thus affects foreign investment in Germany.

Despite Germany's current image as a nation beset by racist gangs, the fact of the matter is that anti-Semitism impinges on few Jews on a day-to-day basis.

"It's blown out of proportion," said Irene Runge of the Jewish Cultural Organization in eastern Berlin, a secular group which sponsors lectures, seminars, films, musical events and Oneg Shabbats. "We read about it in the newspapers. But I don't feel it."

Jerzy Kanal [Frank Schroder]

Hermann Simon, chair of a synagogue-renovation project in Berlin, tends to agree.

He and his wife, Deborah, who was born in Montreal and raised in Toronto, have never personally experienced anti-Semitism. But in a widely-held view, the Simons urge the government to enforce existing anti-racist laws far more vigorously.

Filip Goldscheider, a 24-year-old university student in Frankfurt, has felt the sting of implicit, or "indirect," anti-Semitism. "But I don't think the Germans are more anti-Semitic than the French. Anti-Semitism isn't something specifically German."

* * *

Almost 50 years after the crash of the Third Reich, there are hardly any Jews in Germany who would describe themselves as full-blown "German Jews."

"We have Jews today who want to call themselves Germans," said Bubis, who was born in the then German city of Breslau in 1927 and returned to Germany after the war to amass a real estate empire. "But they're no more than 20 percent of the population."

Bubis himself is clear about his identity. "I don't recognize myself as a German. I am a German citizen of the Jewish faith." He feels at home in Frankfurt, where he lives. But he concedes that he is more at ease in Paris than in Offenbach, a city close to Frankfurt.

Originally a Polish Jew, whose parents perished in Treblinka, Kanal simply refers to himself as "a Jew in Germany," an appelation which the majority of Jews accept as a truism.

"To be a 'German Jew' is to forget the past a little," he said, referring to the Nazi era and Germany's central role in the Holocaust.

After World War II, Germany was practically Judenrein, bereft of Jews. Approximately 200,000 displaced Eastern European Jews passed through Germany in the aftermath of its defeat, bound for destinations like Israel, Canada and the United States.

Only a handful remained in Germany, stigmatized by their fellow Jews in the Diaspora. "Forty years ago," said Kanal, "virtually the only Jews here were survivors." Since then, the community has been gradually supplemented by Hungarian, Czech, Iranian, Israeli and, of late, Soviet Jews. By Bubis' count, 40 percent of the Jews in Germany are without German citizenship, which is normally difficult to obtain.

More than one-third of Germany's Jewish residents and/or citizens are of Soviet origin, and in the future the proportion is expected to be higher. In Berlin, at least half of those registered with the community are former Soviets.

Like most new immigrants, they have run into difficulties in adjusting to German society. But Szajak is sure they are here to stay, while Runge believes they have already changed the "demographic face" of the community.

As she put it: "The Jewish future in Germany is Russian."

The Jewish World

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

A sign of the times:

Ignatz Bubis, chairman of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, is receiving more hate mail than ever. Two years ago, he used to get one anti-Semitic letter for every 20 positive letters. Today anti-Jewish letters comprise about one-third of his mail.

And, he adds in an interview, letter writers are bolder. "In the old days, the anti-Semitic letters were anonymous. Now, they're signed."

On this basis alone, it is clear that anti-Semitism in Germany is on the rise.

More broadly, anti-Semitic crimes have jumped considerably since German unification in October 1990.

Werner Bergmann, a sociologist associated with the Centre for Research on Anti-Semitism at the Technical University in Berlin, says that post-war Germany has suffered through four anti-Semitic waves.

The first three occurred from 1949-1952, 1958-1961 and 1979-1981. The latest, which began in 1991, is is the most serious ever in terms of the number of incidents.

It's generally agreed that the overt anti-Semitism which has emerged here of late was triggered by xenophobia — which itself was spawned by the debate over German identity following unification and the still-burning issue of foreigners and asylum-seekers living in Germany. In Bubis' opinion, the intifadah — the Palestinian uprising in the territories — was also a factor.

According to Bergmann, cemeteries and Holocaust memorials have been the main targets of anti-Jewish vandals.

In 1992, 80 cemeteries were desecrated, as many as were pillaged from 1926-1931. In the same year, fire seriously damaged a barracks commemorating Jews murdered at the Sachsenhausen memorial, a concentration camp during the war. Two perpetrators, aged 19 and 22, were apprehended. In a subsequent trial, the judge acquitted them.

Former concentration camps in Furstenberg and Uberlingen, now housing museums or memorials, also have been attacked.

Anti-Semitic wave

Last March, Lubeck's sole synagogue was firebombed — the first such crime since Kristallnacht in November 1938. Ironically, it had been spared by the Nazis because they feared that an adjacent art museum would be burned down. Two months ago, four suspects, aged 19 to 24, were arrested. In the aftermath of the bombing, 100 artists opened an exhibit to raise funds for repairing the shul.

Anti-Semitic crimes range far and wide, says Robin Ostow, a sociologist who divides her time between Toronto and Berlin. In Munich, on the eve of Passover, residents of a Jewish seniors' home received letters containing neo-Nazi propaganda. In the Hohenschonhausen district of Berlin, anti-Semitic pamphlets were found.

Last January, the trial of two skinheads accused of beating a man to death whom they believed to be Jewish opened in Wuppertal. Three months later, 13 Jews in Nuremberg received a letter informing them of their imminent deportation. In May, seven drunken soldiers in Bonn shouted anti-Semitic slogans on a bus and beat up a passenger.

In the past few years, two right-wing radicals have been convicted for incitement, instigation of racial hatred and reviling the memory of the dead. Last month, Gunter Deckert, leader of the National Democratic party, received a one-year suspended sentence with probation and was fined. Deckert has sued Bubis for allegedly fomenting racial hatred against Germans. Meanwhile, Otto Remer, an old Nazi, was slapped with a 22-month prison sentence for denying the Holocaust.

Surveys suggest that a strong minority of Germans are hostile to Jews.

A 1992 poll conducted by Der Spiegel showed that 13 percent are hardcore anti-Semites, 48 percent are free of anti-Jewish attitudes, while the rest hold some anti-Semitic beliefs.

A 1994 study carried out by the American Jewish Committee found that one in five Germans are unfavorably disposed to Jews, while residents of the now-defunct East Germany are more tolerant toward Jews than their Western counterparts.

Volunteering comes naturally to new JWF president

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For Glenys (Glennie) Lindenberg, who was installed as president of Toronto Jewish Women's Federation (JWF) in March, volunteer work is "an integral part of living Jewishly."

The 40-year-old lawyer and mother of two traces her involvement with the organized Jewish community to the early days of B & P (Business and Professional Women's Network, a division of the United Jewish Appeal Women's Division), of which she was a founding member in 1981.

A recipient of UJA's Young Leadership award in 1989, Lindenberg has also served on the board of United Synagogue Day Schools.

In her current position, Lindenberg oversees the running of the umbrella group for 50 local Jewish women's volunteer organizations which represent a broad ideological spectrum.

"It's important to have organizations which can meet the needs of people at various stages in their lives," Lindenberg told The CJN recently at her downtown office.

B & P originally appealed to her because it was targeted at working women. Lindenberg grew up in a traditional home and went to Associated Hebrew Day Schools until Grade 12, but says, "I didn't realize how interested I was [in the organized community] until I got involved."

The Jewish community is about to face "a real challenge" in the area of accommodating women volunteers, more and more of whom are working full-time, she said. Lindenberg herself has had a full-time general law practice in partnership with her husband Nathan for the past 16 years.

With flexible hours, she is able to fit JWF meetings into her schedule more easily, but the demands of her practice and the needs of her children, who are now 11 and 9, remain constant.

"It is difficult sometimes," she said. "For women who work full-time in a more traditional job situation, it's very difficult if you don't have that flexibility. I think most volunteer organizations are looking for innovative ways to attract and maintain membership."

Because JWF tries to avoid duplication of services, Lindenberg is focusing on strengthening the umbrella group's connections with its affiliates so that members will feel connected to the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, of which JWF is a department, and to the Jewish community as a whole.

President's Council meetings, where leaders of the affiliate organizations come together, have been "excellent," said Lindenberg, and there is talk of reinstituting a "buddy system" between senior JWF leadership and leaders of the affiliate organizations.

Glennie Lindenberg

"It's not enough to say that Jewish Women's Federation is an umbrella organization," said Lindenberg. "[Affiliates] can look to us for education and advocacy, and as a resource for programming."

The issue of agunot [women whose husbands won't give them a Jewish divorce] has taken a prominent place on the JWF agenda. On such issues, JWF "can be a facilitator for Jewish women to speak with one voice."

The status of women in Jewish organizations is also an issue of concern to JWF, Lindenberg said. "Ultimately, enhancing the status of women [by offering equal opportunities for advancement to leadership roles] will benefit the community," she added, noting that there have already been positive changes in that area.

The theme of Jewish continuity underlies almost every issue Lindenberg mentions. "It's all intermingled. If an issue is important to JWF, ultimately it's important to the Jewish community.

"I think the progamming we do in terms of outreach to newcomers and Russian immigrants enhances Jewish continuity," she says by way of example. "If you connect newcomers to the Jewish community, then you are reinforcing their Jewish identity, which will in turn enhance their continuity within the Jewish community," Lindenberg said.

Continuity is an issue about which she feels strongly. A family trip to Poland two years ago, where she visited her parents' hometowns, has become "a personal metaphor for the responsibilities of leadership from generation to generation. That's what it's all about — passing it on."

JSC seeks leader

MONTREAL — The two-year-old Jewish Sports Congress (JSC) is looking for a new leader.

"The Jewish Sports Congress has come to a point where it needs the leadership and guidance of an active board chair," said Mike Cohen, the JSC's executive vice president.

The JSC is an all-volunteer, non-profit organization which uses sports to increase Jewish identity, pride, unity and connection to Israel, while helping to improve interracial relations.

The JSC was founded by Dave Kufeld with Marty Glickman as board chair. Sandy Koufax, Red Auerbach, Marv Levy, Fred Lebow, Mark Spitz, Bud Selig, Bud Greenspan, and famed sportscasters Howard Cosell and Marv Albert are some of the renowned sports personalities involved with the organization.

Among the projects already underway are the publication of Jewish Sports and Fitness, a tabloid newspaper celebrating Jewish sports achievement, the Jewish All-America awards, and the Olympic Martyrs Commemorative, in honor of the 11 Israeli Olympians killed at the 1972 Munich Olympic Games.

The JSC is also planning to launch the Jewish Sports Speakers Network and the Jewish Sports News Bureau.

If you are interested in the JSC, or know of someone who may be, please contact the Jewish Sports Congress by phone at (516) 482-5550, by fax at (516) 482-5583, or write to us at POB 4549 Old Village Station, Great Neck, NY 11023.

Singles help out NIF

TORONTO — Over 200 Jewish singles from Toronto, Montreal, Ottawa, Winnipeg, upstate New York, Ohio and Michigan danced a Sunday night away earlier this month in support of the New Israel Fund (the joint North American/Israeli venture which funds Israeli non-profit organizations addressing social and economic issues).

The dance was the culmination of the first annual Fabulous Jewish Singles Weekend, hosted by Sharyn Gunter of Sharyn's Singles Soirees at the Inn on the Park Hotel.

Gunter, a widow who ran Jewish Dateline in the early 1980s, is motivated to donate money by memories of the financial difficulties she suffered after her husband's death. "I desperately wanted to be able to give tzedakah, but it was just impossible during that hard part of my life. Now that I am on my feet and living a decent, albeit modest life, I feel that I want to give something back to the community," she said.

For information about upcoming singles events/fundraisers, contact Gunter at 416-733-9848.

Russian artist finds his niche illustrating business articles

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Belarussian-born artist Leon Zernitsky immigrated to Toronto four years ago, he had to translate newspaper headlines from a dictionary.

Since then, Zernitsky has established himself as a media illustrator, carving a career for himself illustrating business articles for publications such as Canadian Lawyer, Financial Post Magazine, the Toronto Star and the Globe and Mail. He has also done work for Hilton Hotels, Oxford University Press and TV Ontario.

Zernitsky's witty and sophisticated renderings have won him two gold and bronze awards from CAPIC, the Canadian Association of Photographers and Illustrators in Communications.

The Zernitsky family — Leon, his wife Lena, and their now-teenage daughter Ilana — arrived in Toronto from Italy, where they had spent a year awaiting Canadian immigration papers while Leon worked as a street portraitist.

Once in Canada — with minimal English and no business contacts — Leon set about finding work. Using Lena's better English, they scoured the Yellow Pages to target potential art buyers and slowly build a clientele. A series of odd jobs helped pay the bills. For seven months he worked seven nights a week as a security guard, sleeping in the mornings and devoting afternoons to his art. Lena, 38, a computer programmer by training, has been working in a bakery and studying for an insurance career in her spare time.

Before leaving the former Soviet Union, Zernitsky, as an artist, needed permission from the local Ministry of Culture for each piece he wanted to take out of the country. Most of his works were claimed by the government. "They were afraid that maybe I would be the next [Marc] Chagall," he quips.

Actually, Chagall hailed from the same region. Gomel, Zernitsky's birthplace, is a city with a centuries-old Jewish history. Although it was against the law to keep Jewish books, Zernitsky's grandfather kept a siddur hidden for use on Shabbat and Jewish holidays; his grandmother prepared her own kosher cheese and asked a rabbi-cum-shoichet to ritually slaughter chickens for her.

Leon Zernitsky

When he was in first grade, Zernitsky's artistic talents were noticed and he began taking private art lessons with a well-known artist.

After receiving a degree in Graphic Arts from Moscow Polygraphical University in 1973, he worked as an art director in a government advertising agency and illustrated 25 children's books.

A typical Zernitsky children's illustration, elegant in an old-world style and embellished with Russian calligraphy, depicts a smartly outfitted bear — complete with lorgnette — lifting his top hat as he struts away from an overdressed monkey studying herself in a hand mirror.

These days, it's just as likely for Zernitsky's art to reflect harsh economic times with dark colors and themes, but always with a sense of humor.

His recent CAPIC award-winner is a case in point: a cartoonishly scary man in a business suit is shown eating a smaller businessman against an ominous background. "It's a dark part of business when big companies eat small companies. Many people go bankrupt," said Zernitsky. But even when it comes to serious issues, he pointed out, what sells in Canada is "funny, innovative stuff, not boring.

"People here are hard-working. They want entertainment," he said.

Zernitsky has proven himself to be hard-working too, and he is happy with the turn his life and his career have taken.

An unexpected bonus of immigrating was finding Canadian relatives who looked him up after seeing an illustration of his in the Globe and Mail and noting the unusual surname. Leon's siblings and his mother have made aliyah; Lena has no relatives.

Leon works in a corner of the plant-filled North York apartment the family shares with Kesha the budgie and Freddy, a 9-year-old basset hound. "Even established artists tell me you'll never be rich in Canada," he says, "but you are free, you are doing what you like and you can pay your bills. For artists this is the main thing."

Yiddish for the young

TORONTO — For the first time in several years, Torontonians of all ages will be able to learn Yiddish this fall.

Free classes will be conducted at Associated Hebrew Schools on Finch east of Bathurst for students from junior kindergarten to Grade 9, with high school credit courses offered at Earl Haig Secondary School. At the post-secondary level, three Yiddish courses will be available as credits at the University of Toronto.

Informal conversation classes, for youths and adults at all stages of Yiddish proficiency have been planned, as well, in various locations. Organizers are promising only modest fees.

The Toronto Board of Education and the University of Toronto are the Yiddish education program's other sponsors.

For course dates and locations, call Sylvia Lustgarten at the committee for Yiddish (416) 635-2883, extension 155.

HONORARY DEGREE FOR HALBERT

Gerald Halbert, left, was presented with an honorary doctorate by Hanoch Gutfreund, president of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, as Yehoshua Ben-Arieh, rector, looked on at the 57th meeting of the university's board of governors. Halbert, who lives in Toronto, is chair of the executive and past national president of Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University. He is president of the United Israel Appeal of Canada and has also served as president of the United Jewish Appeal of Metropolitan Toronto. Halbert is the 16th Canadian to receive an honorary PhD from the Hebrew University. Among the other eight people receiving honorary doctorates at the same ceremony were Israeli composer Naomi Shemer, British hairdressing mogul Vidal Sassoon, and Justice Richard Goldstone, a community leader in South Africa.

Golfers come out to play for charity tournament

TORONTO — Close to 200 golfers participated in the fourth annual charity golf tournament organized by the Toronto New Leadership Division of The Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation.

Tournament chair Kelly Silverstein called it a huge success.

Proceeds of the event, which was held at the Kleinburg Golf & Country Club, will go to the pediatric cardiology unit in the new Comprehensive Heart Institute at Shaare Zedek Medical Center. The division has pledged $100,000 for the centre.

Approximately 50 businesses enrolled as sponsors, with McDonald's of Canada again serving as patron.

The winning foursome of the shotgun start tournament was made up of Shawn Goldenberg, Rich Kochman, Ken Weinberg and Lorne Cooper.

"We are looking forward to an even greater success next year," said division chair Michael Kerzner.

The 1995 tournament will be co-chaired by Mark Grammer and Joseph Young. For information call 781-3584.

Minyan held on Mirvish's 80th birthday

Torah portion same as at Honest Ed's bar mitzvah

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ed Mirvish's 80th birthday was observed in a Thursday morning prayer service led by Rabbi Joseph Kelman in Ed's own office with a 300-year-old Iranian Torah for the scripture reading.

"It's the first time I've had tefillin on since my bar mitzvah 67 years go," said Mirvish.

Honest Ed read part of the service in faultless Hebrew and was called to the Torah for an aliyah, while about 30 friends and relatives attended.

"This is the sanctuary, and the banquet hall is upstairs," Mirvish joked, as he welcomed guests to the unusual surroundings. (A kosher beakfast was served in the upper part of the Honest Ed office.)

The Iranian Torah is one of two Mirvish purchased several years ago. It has a permanent place in his office; the other he donated to the Royal Ontario Museum.

Despite its age, the ornate Torah has perfectly visible lettering, though smaller than in some Torahs. Rabbi Kelman and his son, Rabbi Jay Kelman, who read the morning's portion, had to peer in closely and use the Torah's silver pointer.

"We express gratitude for the blessings that Ed Mirvish has received and given back to the community at large," said Rabbi Kelman, of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

Anne Mirvish, Ed's wife, read a part of the service in English, while son David Mirvish and cousin Russel Lazar were also honored with aliyahs. Sol Dennis, of Shaarei Tefillah Synagogue, an old friend, was the reader, while Syd Greenstein of Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue was the gabbai.

The senior Rabbi Kelman interspersed the prayers with cogent explanations particularly addressed to the non-Jewish friends attending.

Mirvish told The CJN that he and his wife are members of both Holy Blossom Temple and Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda. "That way we keep in touch," he said.

One friend who got a special welcome was Leonard Bernstein who came to Ed's office direct from the minyan at the Bloor Street JCC, a few blocks down the street, which he attends every day. "I got really worried that Ed is going to have a daily minyan in opposition to ours and would serve a better kiddish than we do," said Bernstein.

By a remarkable co-incidence, Rabbi Kelman said the portion of Torah read at the service was the same as the one read at Mirvish's bar mitzvah 67 years ago.

As to that event in 1927, Mirvish said it took place in a Cecil Street synagogue (he doesn't remember its name) and his father and mother could not close their Dundas Street fruit store to attend. "We had a Rabbi Dinkin who gave Hebrew classes upstairs of the store and he took me to the bar mitzvah," Mirvish said. "They threw a few nuts at me, and that was it, it was over just like that.

Others attending included Ruth Kelman, Ilana Kelman, Hilliard Conway (David Mirvish's father-in-law), Isaac Rics, Barney Barenholtz, Jack and Ralph Grossman, Rosalie Herman of Baltimore, and Dr. Robert and Mary Stein, of Easton, Penn.

On his 80th birthday, Honest Ed Mirvish was honored at a morning prayer service in his office where a 300-year-old Iranian Torah is permanently located. Conducting the service were Rabbi Joseph Kelman (right) and his son, Rabbi Jay Kelman. By coincidence, the Torah portion read was the same as that read during Mirvish's bar mitzvah 67 years ago. Canadians heading to Kiev for world Yiddish conference

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The once-sputtering flame of Yiddish will blaze anew in the historic city of Kiev in Ukraine August 25-30, when the seventh session of the World Council for Yiddish is held.

Canadians have been prominent in the World Council from the beginning and this year will be no exception, as the National Yiddish Committee of Canada will be represented by Simcha Simchovitch, Toronto Yiddish poet, teacher, and former curator of the Beth Tzedec Museum. He will be joined by Ariel Koprov, Yiddish author and member of the Toronto Yiddish Committee, who also participated in the sixth session in Moscow.

The program includes a gala opening, six plenary sessions, performances of Yiddish theatre from Israel and Poland, and tours to sites of Jewish interest. Large delegations from Israel, Russia, Poland, France, Australia and Argentina are expected to attend.

A circular from the World Council states that there are 150,000 Jews in Kiev (450,000 in all of Ukraine), many of them Yiddish speaking, who are striving to re-establish their religious and cultural institutions, and a Jewish world gathering will greatly strengthen their confidence and efforts. The Kiev meeting was planned with the cooperation of the governments of Israel and Ukraine and the Union of Ukrainian Writers, in whose magnificent building the session will be held.

Simcha Simchovitch

The World Council for Yiddish and Jewish Culture came into being in Tel Aviv in 1976. Under the leadership of Itzhak Korn, former chair of the World Zionist Organization and deputy minister to Levy Eshkol, the Council tried to promote, often successfullly, Yiddish culture both in Israel and in the Diaspora.

During this period, a Yiddish teachers program, headed by a former Torontonian, Rabbi Gershon Weiner, was established at the Bar Ilan University in Tel Aviv, and Yiddish language and literature were introduced as electives in a number of high schools in Israel. Thanks to the endowment of the late Toronto philanthropist Ben Himel, Yiddish also became a subject of instruction in some Israeli elementary schools.

Yiddish speaking clubs and circles were formed in many cities in Israel, the United States and Canada. Many of them joined and supported the World Council for Yiddish and looked to it for leadership and guidance.

However, the activities of the World Council were hindered during the last few years by the prolonged illness of its chair Itzhak Korn, who died recently.

With the joining of the Israeli Yiddish Writers Union headed by the novelist and outspoken writer Mordchai Tzanin, the World Council was strengthened and revitalized. The reorganized Council moved to new quarters in the building of the Jewish Agency in Tel Aviv and began its activities anew.

The Yiddish committee at the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, chaired successively by J.B. Salsberg, Sam Lipshitz and Gerry Kane, was always supportive of the World Council. Large delegations from Toronto participated in the first session of the Council in 1976 in Tel Aviv and later, in 1982 in Montreal. In 1991, Judge Philip Givens, national chair of the Yiddish Committee of Canada, attended the sixth session of the World Council in Moscow.

On his return from the Kiev sessions, Simchovitch will report to the Toronto Jewish public on the situation of the Jews in Ukraine and on the proceedings of the Council.

Israeli educational program unites Jewish and Arab kids

By HILLEL YEAGER

GIVAT HAVIVA, Israel — Children Teaching Children (CTC) is the largest Israeli educational program seeking to foster coexistence, pluralism, and democratic values among Israel's Arab and Jewish citizens.

CTC recently ended the school year with almost 1,000 of its participants convening at the Jewish-Arab Centre for Peace, located at the Givat Haviva Institute.

Givat Haviva, located in northern Israel, is a 50-acre facility named after Haviva Reik, who perished after parachuting into Nazi-occupied Slovakia.

During the closing day activities, Jewish and Arab sixth-graders partook in various games, workshops, and folk dancing and sporting events. In discussion groups, students debated such topics as the status of women and the peace process.

During lunch, students ate together under a giant tent and program director Shuli Hartman addressed the gathering. She called on the Ministry of Education, one of CTC's government sponsors, to implement the teaching of Arabic in Jewish schools beginning at an earlier age. The program ended with musical performances by Jewish and Arab artists.

But with a far more lasting outcome than the one-day summit would provide, CTC's multi-faceted approach to learning gives children the opportunity to meet in a neutral setting, the classroom, where they are given an opportunity to talk, laugh, learn, and discover.

This is an interaction that Jews and Arabs are rarely afforded in Israel. CTC challenges stereotypes and generalizations by bringing Jewish and Arab youngsters face to face.

Before participating in this program, Jewish students indicated they were afraid to go to Arab villages. Overcome with fear of the "enemy," some did not want to board the buses. But the experience had a powerful effect. After the first few encounters, a visit to an Arab village was transformed from an ominous mystery to a simple routine.

In some cases, friendships were forged between Arab and Jewish children. After the Hebron massacre, Jewish students wrote letters of condolence to the Arab students, expressing their horror at the tragedy. The Arab students responded in kind following the bombings of Israeli buses in Afula and Hadera.

But the results of the program are not limited to Arab-Jewish relations. The program sparks the children's curiosity and whets their appetites to learn. In the end, almost no one remains unchanged though the views that emerge are complex.

Parents directly involved

Said one girl from the town of Misgav: "I used to think it was so easy for me to make ties with everyone. I learned that it is not always so easy."

Miriam Dagan, a CTC coordinator, said of the program's participants: "If it was easy, they wouldn't need us. Because it's difficult, the need for CTC arises."

For the teachers, who are also a mix of Arabs and Jews, aside from learning more about each other's communities, CTC facilitates the acquisition of different educational techniques.

Some of the teachers began participating in the program before the intifadah in the West Bank and Gaza Strip began. Throughout the intifadah and during the Gulf War, they continued to work together.

Each new challenge to Arab-Jewish relations is immediately confronted and discussed. The influence of the CTC project is also felt by the students' parents, who are directly involved throughout the entire program.

During the convention, it was clear that a two-year program could not fully erase the painful history of Jewish-Palestinian relations. At lunchtime, the Jewish youth sat in one group while the Arabs formed circles of their own. While the Jewish youngsters cheered the Hebrew songs, the Arab students were silent. Yet both accommodated one another and permitted the other group its space.

Shuli Dichter, a volunteer in the CTC program, stressed the ever-increasing importance of preparing the future generations for the sweeping changes ahead.

"We must prioritize the establishment and continuation of contact between Arab and Jewish children, especially since the future is here today," he said.

The program continues to grow and improve. 1994 marks the release of CTC's first handbook. It is a result of the teachers' response to the changes occurring in the Middle East on a daily basis.

Provided that CTC continues to meet its funding needs, the project aims to expand and reach even more children in the years to come. As historic handshaking and political posturing usher in a new era of hope, CTC continues to replace the politics of hatred and fear in Israel with those of understanding and compassion.

AUSTRALIAN STATE REPS VISIT BAYCREST

Government representatives from the State of Victoria in Australia, recently visited Baycrest Centre, their only Canadian stop on an around-the-world trip to consult with leading facilities on the care of the aged. Seen (from left) Rob Knowles, Victoria's minister for aged care and minister for housing; Dr. Michael Gordon, vice-president, medical services and head, geriatric and internal medicine for Baycrest Centre; Robert Solly, deputy secretary, housing, Victoria; Andrejs Zamurs, deputy secretary, aged care division, Victoria; and Stephen Herbert, president and CEO of Baycrest. The men conferred on innovative techniques and current issues involved in responding to the needs of an aging population. Each year, Baycrest hosts visits by dozens of government representatives, administrators of hospitals and nursing homes, health care professionals and social workers. Recently, Baycrest has consulted with groups from New Zealand, India, China, the British Isles, Europe, Japan and the Middle East.

Jabotinsky failed to see Canada's worth

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The late Ze'ev Jabotinsky, founder of the Zionist Revisionist movement, would have got more support here in the 1920s and 1930s if he had realized that Canada was different from the United States, said Michael Brown, a York University humanities and Hebrew-language professor.

Although Jabotinsky had many followers in Europe, especially in Poland, he had relatively few supporters in North America, said Brown.

He noted that Jabotinsky failed to pick up on the enthusiasm Canadian Jews had for Zionism and underestimated his Canadian followers on his three visits here.

In a letter written after his 1926 visit to Canada, Jabotinsky claimed that his Canadian followers were either "immature youths" or "people of the past generation."

"Had he had put a little more effort into Canada, I think he probably would have had more success," said Brown, the guest speaker at the recent 54th memorial service for Jabotinsky.

The service, presented by Herut-Likud and Betar Tagar of Canada, was held at the Toronto Zionist Centre. Cantor Yehudah Rottner of Beth David Synagogue sang the memorial prayer.

Jabotinsky was born in Russia in 1881 and died in the United States in 1940. After abandoning his socialist ideals, Jabotinsky organized the Zionist Revisionist movement, as a result of his dissatisfaction with the existing Zionist leadership.

Brown said Jabotinsky's militant message of mass aliyah was not as effective in North America, where most Jews aspired to middle-class status and "felt sort of at home."

He can see why Jabotinsky did not try harder to win more supporters in Canada, given that the Jewish community here was tiny.

"It was relatively poor in [financial] resources as far as the Jewish community was concerned. Jews were immigrants — they didn't have a lot of political clout — and in that sense maybe he was right to not put a lot of effort into this country," he said.

Jabotinsky had some disdain for North American Jews, Brown explained. Like many Zionists, he thought they were materialistic. He also thought they were whiners. In the '20s, Jabotinsky said that the problems in North America were just child's play compared to the difficulties in Europe.

During Jabotinsky's lifetime the majority of North American Zionists, who chose to align themselves with the left, rejected Revisionism. The movement succeeded decades later with the 1977 Likud victory in Israel, said Brown, after which the Revisionist message was more widely accepted in the Diaspora.

A man with a great deal of charisma and a gift for speaking, Jabotinsky was almost worshipped by his followers and demonized by his opponents.

"When he got up and spoke he could carry a crowd even if he said outrageous things," Brown told The CJN.

Winnipeg leader dies

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — When Saul Simkin was asked to be the 1993 honoree for the Jewish National Fund's annual Negev Dinner, he accepted only on condition that his sisters and brothers be honored with him.

That was typical of Simkin, who passed away on June 21 at the age of 78.

Except for a term as chair of the United Israel Appeal, Simkin eschewed the limelight according to his brother Abe, preferring to contribute to the community behind the scenes, where he was a major force in the Jewish and business communities.

The Simkin family's construction company, BACM Ltd., of which Saul Simkin was the chair and CEO, was one of western Canada's leading developers and builders.

Abe Simkin notes that the company was involved in the construction of every major airport and dam between Winnipeg and Vancouver. The company, now part of Genstar (of which Saul Simkin was a director) builds 5,000 houses a year and employs 10,000 people across the country.

Abe Simkin says his brother Saul was a major supporter of all Jewish charities, local and Israel-based, and many non-Jewish ones. He was a founder, lifelong supporter and major contributor to the Rosh Pina Synagogue (Winnipeg's second largest Conservative synagogue) and worked actively on many of the synagogue committees.

Simkin is survived by two daughters and his five brothers and sisters.

Jewish educator says goodbye after 37 years in school system

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

Hana Warner presents Esther Gold with a "Megillat Esther", scroll of good wishes, on her retirement as Hebrew Studies principal of USDS.

TORONTO — She may have fallen into the profession by accident, but Esther Gold has become a fixture in the Toronto Jewish education scene.

She recently retired after 17 years as Hebrew Studies principal of United Synagogue Day School.

Relaxing in her Thornhill home, Gold reminisced to The CJN about coming to Canada from her birthplace, Tel Aviv. A graduate in sciences from the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, she found herself overqualified for most of the jobs available through Jewish Vocational Service.

"So they took me upstairs (this was in 1957, at the old community services building on Beverley Street) to the Board of Jewish Education, and they asked me to teach at the new Neptune branch of Associated Talmud Torah."

Shortly afterwards, the late Dr. Levi Jacober asked her to teach at the Associated Hebrew Day School. She remained there until her son Ari was born.

While raising her children (Ari, now an endodontist, and Doron, who just graduated from Osgoode Hall Law School), she began to teach at Adath Israel. She stayed there for 15 years, nine as a teacher, six as principal.

In 1975, she returned to Associated as Hebrew Studies Principal at the Finch campus. In 1977, she moved to USDS as principal of the Hebrew Studies Department for the Bathurst, Bayview and eventually, the Richmond Hill campuses.

This is not to suggest that Gold is untrained, educationally speaking. It's just that, as she describes it, "first I did, then I got my degree. I was teaching before I got my teacher's certificate [at Midrasha]; I was a principal at Associated when I got my BA; and I was principal at USDS when I got my principal's certification.

"My courses really had meaning — it wasn't just theories."

Innovation has been a hallmark of her career.

While at Adath Israel, Gold began taking the 11- and 12-year-old students to visit the Lubavitch community in New York, something that was seen at the time as decidedly radical.

"I saw a value in these trips," Gold said. "It gave the kids the chance to experience Shabbat. Also, those kids from Conservative homes, who had never had any contact with Chassidism, came back with a lot of respect for them. It was a lesson in ahavat Yisrael."

She also instituted a sukkah project, in which a family in the school would undertake to buy materials to build a sukkah. The class would build and decorate it, and on Sukkot they would eat there.

Her high school students were involved in choosing the topics they would study so that their studies would be meaningful to them. "Now we are used to that sort of thing — then it was an innovation," she says.

She modestly gives credit to the other staff and students for the blossoming of USDS, but when pressed, she does admit to being especially pleased with her influence on the development of Hebrew language education.

"When I came, the level of Hebrew as a spoken language wasn't at the level I expected. I made it my mission to raise this level.

"I convinced the teachers that the way you learn to speak a language is to use it. If the kids have a choice [of what language to speak in class], they will use what's comfortable."

She believes "you have to have faith in your students. They are capable of rising to your expectations."

She incorporated the Bible contest into the school's enrichment program, not necessarily for the sake of winning the contest, (although USDS students have done well over the years) but "as a means to learn how to study Torah intensively."

She is proud that USDS offers "a broad Hebrew education, covering the whole scope of Hebrew knowledge."

She is also proud that the school is "for all students, not just the elite. We are proud of serving the needs of all youngsters, even those who struggle through the double curriculum."

Having been involved in both the supplementary and the day school scene, she notes that day school students don't necessarily come out with more Jewish commitment.

"In afternoon school at that time, there was a close tie between the school, the shul, USY, Camp Ramah and the tefillin club. All together they had quite an impact."

Gold believes that day school may affect the philosophy of life, but not necessarily observance.

She is touched by the marks of esteem and affection shown her on her retirement. The Board of Directors of USDS gave her a farewell party, at which colleagues, friends and family paid her tribute.

She was also honored by the staff of each campus and by several classes as well.

Among the gifts she treasures is a scroll of good wishes ("a real Megillat Esther") from the Bayview campus students, an embroidered challah cover, a poem written in her honor by colleague and friend Tzipporah Balter and a tile challah board fashioned by the senior kindergarten class at the Bathurst campus.

What now for the ever-active Gold?

First, she says, she wants to learn more about her new love, computers, and to work in her garden.

Then, she would like to take up her long-time dream of architectural drafting.

"I'd really like to to go back to doing architectural drafting with a computer. That would combine the two areas I'm excited about."

Benchetrit's right on track as afficionado of road racing

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Going into the finals of the Rolling Thunder Go-Cart Time Trial Challenge, Sidney Benchetrit looked to be in good shape.

In the semis, Benchetrit had clocked an impressive qualifying time, the second fastest among 35 competitors.

But in the final run on the half-mile track at Fun City, things began to change. He clocked a fairly slow 1:08 for his first lap in the two-lap go-round, well behind the 1:05.98 he registered in his qualifying heat.

Realizing he'd have to pick up the pace if he had any hope of finishing first, Benchetrit decided to go for broke. Unfortunately, going into a sharp turn on the indoor track, "the back tires gave out and I began skidding and I lost speed," he said.

The skid cost him any chance of finishing first; instead he had to settle for 14th place out of 15 finalists. The winning time was registered by Jason Bell, 18, whose best lap clocked in at 1:06.75.

Despite his loss, the race, sponsored by Fun City and Molson Indy Fest, has wetted Benchetrit's appetite for more go-cart races. "It was pretty nerve-wracking but fun too," he said.

A road race afficionado, Benchetrit was one of more than 400 racers who plunked down $2 to enter the competition. Proceeds from the registration fees went to the Molson Indy Festival Foundation in support of children's charities.

For Benchetrit, a 15-year-old student at CHAT, the Fun City Challenge was his first major competition against adults. A four-year "veteran" of the go-carting world, Benchetrit began racing the noisy vehicles during summer holidays at Wasaga and Jacksonville.

He immediately took to the sport, enjoying it's speed and technical aspects. "To be a good driver," he says, "you need a feel for the road and to know how to make good turns. You can't lose speed in a turn."

Truer words were never spoken as Benchetrit learned the hard way.

EXPERIENCING ISRAEL

Halifax student Robert Astroff is a young man who is determined to gain the maximum from his year abroad at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem. In addition to his studies in the One Year Program at the Rothberg School for Overseas Students at the university, he was an intern at Israel's Ministry of Justice, working on human rights inquiries from abroad; traveled to Cairo; and participated in hikes throughout Israel with the school's hiking club. Aside from studies and seeing the country, Astroff says that "one of the most important things about being here is experiencing the country and being with Israelis." Astroff, who has completed his BA studies in political science and economics at McGill University in Montreal, will return to Halifax in the fall to study law at the Dalhousie University. After completing his law degree, returning to Israel to live will be one of the options he is considering. In the meantime, he plans to remain an activist on behalf of Israel within his own congregation, Beth Israel Synagogue of Halifax, and on campus as well.

Fellowship awarded

By ROSE TOGMAN HEILBRONN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — On June 12, on the spot in Haifa where two years ago Mikhail Gorbachev accepted an Honorary Doctorate in Science and Technology, Toronto lawyer Arnold Recht, received an Honorary Fellowship from the Technion — Israel Institute of Technology.

Recht, the only Canadian of seven recipients, is president of the Toronto chapter of the Canadian Technion Society; vice-president of the Canadian Technion Society; and a member of the International Board of Governors.

Recht, 46, was born in Germany and emigrated to Canada with his parents when he was three years old. Raised and educated in Toronto, he received his BA from York University and his Law Degree from the University of Western Ontario.

A partner in the law firm of Danson, Recht and Freedman, he specializes in insurance litigation.

Recht first saw the Technion campus in 1971, at 23. He had been invited by Israel's Foreign Ministry on Hazbarah, which gave a two-week course for university students from around the world to familiarize them with Israel's policies and goals.

What impressed him, he says, was that "such a young society had turned to its future, knowing that its bedrock was science and technology."

In 1982 his involvement with Toronto's Technion Society began when he and his law partner Allan Freedman endowed a perpetual scholarship at the Technion in memory of a colleague who at 32 had died of cancer.

Since then, Recht has tried to promote the Technion to the widest possible audience.

He notes that for 70 years the Technion, Israel's primary technological university has been the country's largest centre of applied research.

Ranked among the ten leading technological universities in the world, the Technion prepares its 11,000 students at the undergraduate and graduate level in every major field of engineering, science, architecture and medicine.

Explaining the need for fundraising, Recht explains: "For an Israeli family to support a student for one year requires two months of a parent's salary. That does not include accommodation expenses. And every year government assistance shrinks."

Unlike some other organizations, Recht explains, the Canadian Technion Society has developed an aggressive young leadership division that is grooming a new generation committed to the Technion.

Recht, a child of Holocaust survivors, sensitized to Israel's role in Jewish continuity, attended a week of meetings in Haifa, honoring the Technion's 70th anniversary. He was joined by his wife Sharyn and sons Hershel, 15 and Michael, 12.

Among the 200 delegates from approximately 30 countries were Lord Marcus Sieff, founder of Marks and Spencer; Justice Shoshana Netanyahu (Likud leader Benyamin Netanyahu's mother), Justice of the Suprene Court of Israel; and Israeli military hero, General Amos Horev.

School to honor Singer

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —Shmuel Zahavy Cheder Chabad, an Orthodox boy's day school, is honoring Rhoda Singer with its Woman of Valour Award.

The award will be presented at a dinner to be held 7 p.m. Thursday, August 4 at Beth Avraham Yoseph Synagogue in Thornhill.

Rabbi Yona Shur, executive director of the school, said Rhoda Singer and her husband Yechiel, proprietors of Discount Car & Truck Rental, have been associated with the school since its inception.

"She has shown tremendous sensitivity and keen devotion to the concept of Jewish education for children. This is her life."

Singer's "boundless energy and ardent enthusiasm has been a source of inspiration to all of us at Cheder Chabad."

Education in general is something at which women are leaders, Rabbi Shur noted. "They set the tone for a Jewish home."

Shmuel Zahavy Cheder Chabad is also running its annual lottery draw, which is its main fundraising effort. A subscription of $180, which includes the draw, dinner and a $150 tax deductible donation, gives the chance to win the first prize of a seven-passenger family van. Two round-trip tickets to Israel are the second prize. Third prize is two round-trip tickets to Florida.

The school was founded 10 years ago, with only a handful of boys. It now serves 125 children, from kindergarten to Grade 8. Rabbi Shur said the school has outgrown its temporary quarters at the Lubavitch Community Centre, and would like to acquire its own facility within the next few years.

The school is noted for its high academic standards, its excellent pre-school and well-trained teachers, Rabbi Shur said.

The dinner will also pay tribute to the late Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, "the founder and spiritual mentor of the school," said Rabbi Shur.

It will be "an opportunity for the community to express support for his institution, and to preserve and expand what he built."

It will also be an opportunity for the community to show its support for the Rebbe's followers, "who are going through a tough time."

For more information, contact Rabbi Shur at (905) 771-8060 or fax (905) 771-8062.

Birdwatchers flocking to Presqu'ile park

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — An unusual and even comical species of animal called Hominus Ornithologicus gathers each spring and fall in Ontario's Presqu'ile Provincial Park, situated on the eastern part of Lake Ontario about 155 km east of Toronto.

Specimens of this breed are easily distinguished by their binoculars, sketchbooks, cameras with telescopic lenses, and well-thumbed editions of Peterson's Field Guide to the Birds.

And why shouldn't birdwatchers flock to Presqu'ile? The birds certainly do. About 125 species nest here, and at least 310 feathered species pass through each season enroute to exotic destinations like South America, Europe, Asia, and the Arctic. Presqu'ile is also an instinctual gathering point for Monarch butterflies as they begin their annual migratory trek to Mexico each autumn.

Presqu'ile — French for "almost an island" — is a boomerang-shaped spit of sand and limestone that juts sharply into the lake. Geologists call the land formation a tombolo and say it was formed by retreating glaciers some 12,000 years ago. Richly varied, the park's natural landscape features sand dunes, sand and pebbled beaches, limestone outcroppings, forests, gull-inhabited islands, reedy marshes and pannes — waterlogged meadows carpeted with wildflowers that burst into colorful bloom in late July.

The park is an excellent place to commune with nature. In season, tens of thousands of waterfowl, including many rare shorebirds, are visible from the sandy beach. Along the boardwalk that penetrates deep into a well-populated marsh, visitors are quick to learn the names and distinguishing characteristics of birds like the palm warbler, the stilt sandpiper, the short-billed dowitcher, the brown thrasher, the redthroated loon, the great blue heron.

Presqu'ile's ample scattering of milkweed plants ensures sufficient foodstuff for the multitude of monarch butterflies that descend upon the peninsula early in September. Once it was believed the monarchs hibernated locally throughout the winter, perhaps in hollowed tree trunks. Toronto biologist Dr. Fred Urquhart discovered only a few decades ago that the orange-and-black butterflies fly south to hibernate for the winter atop isolated mountains in Mexico.

Each September around Labor Day, hundreds of Monarchs are tagged and released in the park; one butterfly so tagged was actually retrieved in Mexico. A butterfly-tagging demonstration is popular among visitors to the park each fall.

Presqu'ile is open to day-use visitors as well as overnight campers. The park also features a picnic area, several shoreline and forest trails, the possibility of good windsurfing, fishing and boating; the gradually sloping sandbar beach is considered excellent for children. Interpretive programs and special events are offered until October, and the next good birding weekend is likely Labor Day.

To reach Presqu'ile, simply drive south from the town of Brighton along Highway 2. There are several good bed and breakfast establishments in nearby Brighton. For further information, call the Park office at (613) 475-2204.

A 8-metre-tall tyrannosaurus rex peers over the tree tops in Sea World of Ohio's new "Monster Mash."

Sea World of Ohio turns 25

Some of the world's most agile athletes make their home at Sea World of Ohio, even if most of them get their energy from raw fish.

Home of killer whales Shamu and Namu, Sea World is celebrating its 25th anniversary season from May 21 to September 5.

Visitors can watch three Pacific white-sided dolphins cavort with beauty, skill and grace. Or watch human athletes perform daredevil water skiing stunts and juggling acts.

Who doesn't love dinosaurs or isn't at least captivated by them? The new Monster Marsh is an outdoor display home to 13 life-size animatronic sea monsters and dinosaurs. Featured in this prehistoric marsh are allosarus pteranodon, apatosaurus, stegosaurus, thalassomedon, tylosaurus, velociraptor, protoceratops and the awesome 7,000-kilo tyrannosaurus rex. Special audio effects and dramatic landscaping recreate the Mesozoic era.

At night, park visitors can watch Mermaids, Myths and Monsters, a mini-movie projected onto a 30-metre high water screen, complete with lasers and fireworks. The movie runs from June 10 to August 28, with encore presentations Sept. 2 to 4.

At anytime guests can catch exotic Polynesian dancers, championship divers, California sea lions Clyde and Seamore and other marine mammals.

Permanent attractions include a four-storey, 3,700-sq. m net called Shamu's Happy Harbor, with giant pink flamingos and festive palm trees — a perfect setting for expending extra energy. Also featured in this tropical paradise are nine slippery slides, a splashy water maze, a colorful Fun Ship with real water muskets, the Coco Loco Arcade and many more exciting activities.

Experience the benefit of nature in the Access for All Garden, a unique award-winning landscape that responds to the needs of the disabled. The garden includes a sensory walk for the visually impaired, featuring annuals and perennials with contrasting textures and scents. Those using a wheelchair can enjoy foliage placed in raised planters and built-up grassy areas allowing easy access to the lawn. The highlight of the garden, a water wall, provides relaxing sounds and the opportunity to touch its soothing stream.

All of this and more awaits guests as Sea World of Ohio celebrates 25 years of quality marine life education and incomparable family entertainment. The park is open at 10 a.m. daily, May 21 to Sept. 5, and the weekends of Sept. 10-11 and 17- 18, 1994. Closing times vary. Sea World is easily accessible from Interstates 271, 480 and Ohio Turnpike exit 13. For more informationn, please call (216) 562-8101.

TRAVEL TALK

By BILL GLADSTONE

Jewish Learning at Oxford: Toronto's Institute for Jewish Learning is offering a study junket to Oxford University, departing Toronto Thursday, Aug. 11 and returning Monday, Aug. 22. The planned seminar consists of five days of classes (two each morning) on such topics as Jewish history and philosophy, Midrash Talmud, Israel and Zionism, Jewish-Islamic Relations, and Hebrew and Yiddish literature.

This sample schedule (subject to change) for Monday, August 15 is a colorful example of what participants may expect. After an 8:15 a.m. breakfast, the group convenes at 9.15 to hear Dr. Hugh Williamson, Regius professor of Hebrew, discuss the Hebrew Bible and the Academic World in two sessions, separated by — what else? — a tea break. After lunch comes an introduction to the city and the university, a visit to a typical English pub and a performance of Henry V by the Royal Shakespeare Company in the evening.

Other academics who may be part of the curriculum include Geza Vermes, who is perhaps the best known international authority on the Dead Sea Scrolls, and Martin Goodman, reader in Jewish Studies.

Extra-curricular options include a tour of Oxford's medieval campus, visits to Stratford or the Cotswolds, and a trip to London. The latter would include lunch at Bloom's Kosher Restaurant and a walking tour of the formerly Jewish East End, taking in the Whitechapel Library, notorious sites associated with Jack the Ripper, Brick Lane and the Jewish Ghetto, and the first Yiddish theatre in the Western world (Jacob Adler's).

Accommodations come equipped with full kitchens, and kosher arrangements can be made. Cost per person is $1,599, exclusive of meals. For further details or to make reservations, contact The Institute for Jewish Learning, 4588 Bathurst Street, Toronto M2R 1W6. Phone: (416) 636-1880, ext. 360.

Work-study program

Israel Work-Study Program: The Fall program of Livnot U'Lehibanot (to build and to be built), a 14-year-old work and study program in Israel, begins August 28. Jewish men and women age 21 to 30 with minimal Jewish background are invited to learn more about their Jewish heritage through classes on Jewish holidays, customs, history and politics that are given in campuses in Jerusalem and the mountaintop city of Sefat.

Participants also experience Israel by working on community service projects and hiking throughout the country. Three-week and three-month programs begin in August, December, March, June and July. Livnot U'Lehibanot, 110 East 59th St., 3rd floor, New York 10022 NY. (212) 752-2390.

Specialty Tours of Israel: Global Israel Family Tours (GIFT) of San Francisco specialize in producing "a unique family vacation designed to bring you closer to Israel and to each other." The company is run by Marsha Felton, an American who has lived in Israel and explored the country in depth. She offers comfortable-sized groups, itineraries that range from serious to quirky, and personal meetings wtih Israelis, Druze villagers and Bedouins. Phone (800) 917-4438 or (415) 776-1883.

Main-Danube Canal: The countryside of Franconia, Swabia and Lower Bavaria may be viewed from the decks of a river cruise liner sailing along a canal that opened only recently. Bridging Europe's continental divide, the Main-Danube Canal allows boats to sail inland from Hamburg all the way to the Black Sea. The KD Line's MS Heinrich Heine takes travellers between Nuremberg and Vienna or Budapest. Final embarkation date this year is Oct. 15; rates start at $1,995 per person, double occupancy; all cabins have windows facing out. Contact: German National Tourist Office, 175 Bloor St. East, North Tower, Suite 604, Toronto M4W 3R8. (416) 968-1570.

Temagami Roller Coaster: Guided canoe trips exploring Temagami's old growth forest are part of a summer program of trips and workshops offered by Smoothwater Outfitters, a full-service outfitter that serves the entire Temagami region. The company is also offering several workshops in watercolor painting, print making and photography led by Canadian artists. Some workshops involve much canoeing, while others combine car travel and easy hikes for non-outdoors people. Smoothwater Outfitters is 12 km north of the town of Temagami, a five-hour drive north of Toronto on Highway 11. (705) 569-3539.

Virgin Islands Synagogue Bicentennial: U.S. Supreme Court Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, violinist Itzhak Perlman and other notables are scheduled to participate in a celebration slated for 1995-96 to commemorate the 200th anniversary of the synagogue in St. Thomas, in the U.S. Virgin Islands. Planned events during the 10-month celebration include a tribute to French impressionist Camille Pissaro, an original Sephardi service as it was performed two centuries ago, and an interfaith Passover seder for more than 1,000 participants. For information on special hotel and travel packages, contact the Bicentennial Hotline, (314) 532-5515, or the St. Thomas Synagogue, (809) 774-4312. For travel information on the U.S. Virgin Islands of St. Croix, St. John and St. Thomas, call 1-800-465-USVI.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

DANFORTH CELEBRATION

These children get into the spirit of things during the second annual Summerfest '94, a three-day festival held each June. The festival, which celebrates the vibrant Danforth Avenue community known as Greektown, featured face painting, pony rides, music, a petting zoo and a bouncing room for children. Adults could enjoy Greek dancing and international music showcased on three stages set up along Danforth Avenue. In between, festivals goers wandered into the many shops and restaurants in this unique neighborhood. The festival, sponsored in part by the Royal Bank of Canada and Krinos Foods Canada Ltd., is just one of many ways to celebrate life in the city Greek style. Ellas Restaurant, Banquets and Catering

Ellas, the first Greek restaurant in Toronto, opened in November 1967. (Its name is English for "Greece".) Although it has remained in its original location, Ellas expanded four years ago to provide better facilities for a steady and growing clientele.

Along one wall of the restaurant is an open kitchen, where waiters invite guests to see the wide variety of dishes. Since Ellas opened, such open kitchens have become a common feature of Greek restaurants in Toronto. It is also possible simply to order from the menu.

There is a wide range of Greek cuisine, including a variety of traditional lamb dishes, baby goat and moussaka. Meat dishes are broiled or steamed, and made with fresh herbs. There is also a wide selection of fresh fish, all broiled. The ocean species include grouper, tuna, red snapper, sea snapper, sea bass, shrimps, scallops, calamari, octopus, saltwater salmon and trout. Two or more guests may make a combination platter with several fish or meat dishes.

Ellas uses only fresh grown (on premises) organic spices to cook with and only the best quality products. All seafood is flown in fresh daily so that Ellas can serve the best quality seafood in town.

Ellas offers spanakopita (spinach pie), and a variety of dips such as tzatziki, dolmadis, eggplant or tarama, a caviar dip. The vegetables are always fresh; so is the bread, which is baked on the premises. There are homemade desserts like baklava and custard, as well as fresh fruit and assorted pastries which are also baked on the premises.

Those who want their food to taste good and be healthful at the same time will enjoy Ellas. Cholesterol-free oil is used in cooking, and olive oil in the salads. Nothing is deep-fried. Tests show that Ellas' moussaka has only 350 calories, or one-third the normal calorie count for moussaka. The lamb fricassee has only 250, also only one-third the normal count.

The decor is neo-classical, with murals, reliefs and replicas of statues from classical Greek history. The colors are pastels and light earth tones, creamy white and mint green on the railings. There is plenty of gold leaf, all of it 24-carat gold.

Ellas, which has "class" but is not too expensive, is the ideal place to invite special guests. In September, the management will introduce bouzouki and guitar music and singing; upstairs, in a special room set aside for entertainment, there will be dancing. Almost any size of party or banquet can be accommodated, from an intimate gathering of five or ten up to 1,000 people.

Ellas is at 702 Pape Ave., just north of Danforth on the west side, south of the parking lot south of Pape subway.

It is said that, on Mount Olympus, the gods feasted on ambrosia and nectar. Food and drink beyond anything a mere mortal could imagine.
Of course, mere mortals couldn't dine at Olympus. So Ellas was created. For 25 years, Ellas has served the kind of cuisine even the gods would envy.
Bounteous, fresh daily seafood beyond Poseidon's imagining. Sumptuous steaks. Succulent lamb. And, by Zeus, even delicious vegetarian and low cholesterol dishes.
Come dine with the gods. At Ellas. Toronto's mythic Greek restaurant.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Christina's

There is no place like Christina's. Where else can you go to enjoy traditional belly dancing, hear Greek and international music, and watch the passing parade of local artists, media people and international celebrities until 4 or 5 a.m.? All this, and great food too — Greek specialties, pastas and tasty organic entrees.

The family-owned restaurant on Danforth Avenue in Toronto's lively Greek Town has been growing steadily since it opened in 1986 because they have a recipe for success — and it is no secret.

Dean Kekkas, his brother John, and Steve Tsicolas, known as Uncle Steve, have fun! Dean once sang "New York, New York" with one of the regulars. The atmosphere created by this energetic threesome thoroughly enhances the dining experience.

However, when it comes to food, they get downright serious.

Almost everything from Christina's kitchen is made to order from the freshest ingredients available. "It takes a little bit longer, but you know it's freshly cooked," said Dean. And it's well worth the wait.

On top of traditional Greek fare — assorted appetizers, dips, moussaka, pan-fried calamari, souvlaki and kabobs — they offer some fabulous pasta dishes.

Why does a Greek restaurant serve so much pasta? In fact, Dean says Christina's serves more than any Italian restaurant on the Danforth.

Well, here's the scoop... the Island of Rhodes, where Dean hails from, was part of Italy between 1920 and 1945. The islanders took a liking to Italian food, So as a boy, Dean grew up on pasta.

When Christina's was founded, he decided to try something different — to create a Greek restaurant with a decidedly Italian twist.

Their new chef, Gustavo Maurelli, experienced in both Greek and Italian cuisine, is working on some additions for Christina's ever-expanding menu. Italian dishes rarely seen in the city, updated versions of traditional Greek fare, new seafood dishes — they will all be offered to diners. The new offerings patrons enjoy most will be added to the permanent menu.

For summer, an array of nutty-oil-drizzled salads — salads that include Thai basil, Osaka greens, purple basil and Swiss chard will be offered. Dean recommends the lamb or chicken salads — light meals in themselves and a good deal at under $7.00. "Anyone who tries them, orders them often."

Another light meal and customer favorite is the delicious seafood soup made with fresh salmon, scallops, clams, mussels and calamari. A bargain at $4.85. "For the money it's probably the best seafood soup in Canada, according to our patrons who just come for that," said Dean.

Not afraid to venture where others dare not tread, Christina's became a leader in offering the health-conscious diner organic meat and poultry. Dean stressed that anyone comparing organics to conventional meat and poultry will notice the difference. Organic specialties include steaks, kabobs and hamburgers.

Christina's hours are perfect for everyone, from the lunch crowd to night owls who flock there in the wee hours. Open at 11:30 a.m. each day, they close at 4 a.m. Sundays to Thursdays and 5 a.m. Fridays and Saturdays.

Their late-night business has boomed, Dean says, since night clubs are open later than ever and people are working around the clock. The late-night crowd includes media personalities artists and actors. Don Johnson, Nicholas Cage, Robert DeNiro, Karen Kain, John Stamos of TV's Full House, and countless other celebrities have visited Christina's. They know they can get a perfect plate of pasta and chicken or a delicious vegetarian moussaka casserole there anytime.

Christina's is well-known in the film and TV community. Major U.S. productions in the city use their catering service. When the caterer for RoboCop failed to provide food for the cast and crew, Christina's delivered at three in the morning. A supporter of the Canadian Film Centre on Bayview Avenue, the restaurant donates food to the center's productions.

The number of women dining at Christina's from one a.m. to 4 a.m., alone or in the company of other women, has skyrocketed. "We have changed the course of history for late nights," Dean said. "A few years ago you would have never seen them out at that time." Christina originally decided to stay open until the early morning because there was a real need for safe, late-night establishments, especially for women.

When you walk through Christina's colorful patio, which spills out onto the Danforth, and into the restaurant you feel as if you are stepping into another world — a Greek village. The stuccoed walls of Christina's bar area are painted in bright greens, reds, blues and yellows, an idea John got from the villages of Greece. "The colors are from many different regions of Greece and 2,500 years old," he said.

Hand-made pottery and ceramic sculptures, created by Lynn Fisher, an artist currently living in Greece, line the stuccoed walls of the clay-colored-tinged-with-pink dining room. Other restaurateurs who came to Christina's looking for decorating ideas have copied this color for their dining establishments.

When Christina's opened eight years ago, there were two restaurants on the block. Seven restaurants have opened since, and business at Christina's has quadrupled. Dean is on friendly terms with one of his closest neighbors, Lois Pickett, a co-owner of the Ouzeri. He says they often get together for morning coffee to talk about doing business on the Danforth and how to make Greek Town even better (and it's fantastic now!)

How do you make it better? Add a new and innovative restaurant, of course, which is exactly what Dean and his brother are doing. Their new establishment, Býzas, named after the ancient Greek city of Byzantium, will be open by September. The two brothers will offer an exciting selection of Russian, eastern and middle eastern European, Greek and Italian dishes. The classic cuisine offered at Býzas will be updated with seasonings, fresh herbs and vegetables. "Very traditional, very plain, with a twist," said Dean. "It won't be the same as everywhere else."

Christina's is located at 492 Danforth Ave. No reservations required.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Ouzeri

The Ouzeri has become one of the hottest spots in Toronto's Greek Town in just four short years.

Delicious Greek food served the traditional way, plus a large selection of wine and a Mediterranean-fiesta atmosphere, attract countless local diners and travellers from around the world.

Located in the heart of bustling Greek Town on the Danforth, the Ouzeri has been applauded by local and international food critics alike. Toronto Life, the Toronto Sun as well as British, American and Japanese publications give this restaurant top ratings.

Ouzeri patrons are equally enthusiastic about the food. One gentleman just returned from Greece said that the Ouzeri offers better food than restaurants he visited in Greece.

Owner/chef Fotis Sotiroulis and his partner Lois Pickett have more than a hundred items on their menu — a menu that is sure to please everyone, including vegetarians and dessert lovers.

The restaurant specializes in appetizers and dips, such as eggplant, beet and calamari salads, hummus, marinated artichokes and asparagus vinegarette. Cool, creamy satziki, a combination of yogurt, cucumbers, garlic and seasonings, and tasty mushrooms a la Grec, pan-fried mushroom, green onions, basil and garlic, are customer favorites.

Seafood, fowl, meat and vegetable dishes have been priced individually, so a party of diners can share their food and sample a greater variety from the Ouzeri's superb kitchen. Among the many offerings are fresh salmon, prawns with feta and wine, lamb fricassee with endives, souvlaki, kebobs, grilled vegetables and the fabulous garlicky Ouzeri potatoes made with a hint of lemon.

"At many other restaurants you get a huge platter that you can't finish, while here you can pick and choose," said Pickett.

From the rice/pilaf/pasta/filo pies section of the menu, Chef Sotiroulis recommends the filo-wrapped chicken and rosemary pie. The pie is a departure from the traditional spinach and feta-cheese versions, which the Ouzeri also serves.

Pasta dishes include a seafood spaghetti, seasoned with saffron, and made with plentiful shrimp, clams, scallops and shark

Desserts include lighter items such as mixed fresh fruit and yogurt with fruit as well as honey-soaked baklava. One of their unique dessert offerings is tempting fig and Ouzo ice cream. Ouzo, from which the restaurant derives its name, is anise-flavored Greek liqueur.

Most restaurants sell only a few of their wines by the glassful, but at the Ouzeri a total of 65 — the entire wine list! — can be ordered by the glass. The bestseller is Kouros, a medium white Greek wine priced at $4. a glass. Along with several Greek selections, the list includes Californian, Italian, French, Chilean and Ontario red, white and rose wines. Ports, sherries and dessert wines round out the wine list.

Those who prefer to drink beer have a choice of premium draught — from the Upper Canada, Sleeman's and Connor's breweries — and a variety of domestic and imported bottled beers.

Night owls love the Ouzeri — which is open until the wee hours — but so does everyone else. Children of all ages are welcome, and high chairs are available. "You often see couples with a baby here," said Pickett.

For the luncheon crowd the Ouzeri offers a selection of appetizers, dips, salads, kebobs and filo-wrapped pies at reduced prices from 11:30 a.m. to 2:00 p.m. Patrons select their lunch from trays of cold and hot items carried to the tables by the staff. The luncheon service is available every day of the week, except on special occasions like Mother's Day, when the regular menu applies.

The Ouzeri presents live entertainment with an international flair two days each week. Tuesdays, from 10:00 p.m. to 2:00 a.m., patrons are serenaded by the "bouzouki" — Greek mandolin. Thursday nights diners enjoy watching exuberant Mediterranean dancers and sometimes they join in. June Rowlands, the mayor of Toronto, was recently seen there dancing up a storm.

Even without music, dining at the Ouzeri is an entertaining experience. A two-level restaurant that is open to the street, it gives patrons an ideal vantage point from which to view the rich street life of Greek Town.

The restaurant itself is a terrific spot for people watching. If you look carefully, you might even see a celebrity at the next table. Recently actors Tom Cruise and Nicole Kidman were spotted there.

The charming main dining room is spacious and airy with a high ceiling. Bright splashes of color on white stuccoed walls, eye-catching designs in colorful ceramic tiles, and chairs painted the colors of the rainbow contribute to the Mediterranean-fiesta atmosphere of the Ouzeri.

Youthful, energetic servers wearing colorful vests provide attentive service and aim to please.

The Ouzeri's chef, Foto Sotiroulis, has 22 years of cooking experience, including 5 years spent working in Greece. "He runs the kitchen and I run the front," said Pickett.

A former loans manager, she opened the Ouzeri with Sotiroulis after 30 years in banking. She says she arranged the financing for many restaurants on the Danforth and during that time she fell in love with the area.

Pickett decided to join Sotiroulis in his venture while she was helping him find a location. "When we came across this one, I knew I wanted to be part of it from the moment I walked in," she said.

The Ouzeri, Pickett said, was an immediate success because it is different. "All other restaurants were conventional, fine dining. We walked in with a new concept."

Pickett gets excited when she talks about Greek Town. "There's a Greek Town in every big city, but ours is the nicest and one of the safest," she says.

She and other restaurateurs, including Jerry Petrou of the Athenian Garden and John and Dean Kekkas, the owners of Christina's, work together to solve problems that arise in the area.

Recently they met with area residents and city officials to discuss a proposed by-law to ban dancing in Toronto's restaurants. The bylaw, drafted after a neighborhood residents' association complained about loud music, dancing and parking problems at Danforth-area restaurants, would have restricted dancing to nightclubs and discotheques in designated entertainment districts.

One city official told the Toronto Star the bylaw was aimed at preventing new restaurants from having dance floors or to prevent existing eaterys from creating space for dancing.

The bylaw would have been disastrous, Pickett said. "We do not need a ghost town. We need a vibrant city."

Dancing and music, she says, is part of the culture and the atmosphere of the Danforth.

Pickett, other Greek Town restauranteurs and the Ontario Restaurant Association protested with somewhat mixed results. Now city officials intend to change a zoning bylaw to permit dancing and dance floors in Toronto restaurants with certain limitations. Meanwhile, discussions among Pickett, other owners, area residents and city officials continue.

The Ouzeri, at 500A Danforth Ave., is open from 11:30 a.m. to 2:00 a.m. Sundays to Thursdays, until 4 a.m. Fridays and Saturdays. No reservations are accepted after 7 p.m. on Fridays and 7:30 p.m. on Saturdays. It is best to arrive early on Friday and Saturday evenings to avoid lineups.

Café Miró

Café Miró is owned and operated by Aldo Chang, who grew up with the relaxed, open Spanish style of café. Born and raised in Lima, Peru, Chang has traveled extensively in Europe, especially Spain.

Café Miró draws on the experience of Cafe Havana at Davenport and Avenue Rd., which Chang has owned and operated for just over a year. There, he has already earned a reputation for fine, specially blended and roasted coffee, which Café Miró now brings to the Danforth.

If coffee quality in Toronto has improved over the past few years, much of the credit goes to entrepreneurs like Chang. He specializes in the natural flavors which come, not from additives as with "gourmet coffees", but from the soil and climate of the region where the beans are grown. Café Miró serves mocha java, and will soon be bringing in Jamaican Blue Mountain.

Natural fruit juices are also served, free of additives or preservatives, squeezed on the premises from fresh mangoes, strawberries, oranges and bananas. The pastries are exclusively from Dufflet's, served on a 12-inch plate, with a little garnish like a fresh berry or a dash of whipped cream.

The main dishes on the menu are Spanish-style sandwiches, grilled like panini for crispness, and salads with home-made dressings. There are two or three types of sandwich daily, always with fresh vegetables.

Chang prefers to offer his patrons a small selection of high quality, the kind of sandwich or salad your mother or grandmother would make. As the public grows more health-conscious, it demands food which both tastes good, and is good for you.

At the same time, patrons enjoy the pleasant ambience of Café Miró, whose atmosphere is that of the traditional Spanish café. Inside, there are abstract murals in the style of Miró on the walls, in bright primary colors and organic forms. As the seasons change, the murals are changed as well. The ceilings are high, the walls in white stucco, and the floors tiled in terra cotta. In the front, there is an outside patio.

The music is Mediterranean, from Italy, Spain, Portugal and Greece, and soft so that patrons can carry on conversations. The atmosphere invites you to make yourself at home, relax and unwind, chat with other friendly patrons, and make new acquaintances. The interaction between staff and patrons is also relaxed and easy.

Café Miró is open until 3:00 a.m., seven days a week. Prices are reasonable. A sandwich with a side salad is $4.95, for example, and the Dufflet pastries are $3.95 a slice.

Kapilyo, Reminiscence of Greece

In the heart of Danforth at Chester stands a colorful wine cellar. To those who have visited Greece, Kapilyo is a nostalgic reminiscence. Those who have not yet experienced Greece will want to book a flight as soon as possible.

Kapilyo looks like what it is named for: a stone and brick wine cellar, built below ground to keep the wine cool. The interior has plaster mouldings, oversize tables and chairs in bright primary colors, violet-stained wood, wall murals, and large wine barrels, (some of them functional). Everything contributes to the vibrant eastern Mediterranean atmosphere.

Modern Greek dishes influenced by the cuisine of Asia Minor and the eastern Mediterranean are served on beige and cobalt earthenware. Wine comes to the table in authentic earthen jugs. The ambience is friendly, relaxed and convivial. Occasional musical theme nights.

Lunch specials include vegetarian dishes, meat, fowl and seafood. There are varieties of souvlaki wrapped in pita, with salad and potatoes. "Kokkinisto" beef stew with okra and green beans is $5.95. Calamari "yemisto" in wine sauce with potatoes and vegetables is $5.95. A spiced omelette on a pita, with feta cheese, Greek salad and roast potatoes or fries, is $4.95.

Dinner specials include meat or vegetarian mousaka for $8.95, bifteki (ground beef, prepared Greek style) for $7.95, and half a free-range chicken for $8.95. The fish dishes include red snapper for $14.95, salmon steak for $9.95, and a seafood platter for two for $9.00 per person. These are only a few items from a large, varied menu.

For both dinner and lunch, Kapilyo offers dozens of "mezedes"—appetizers like tangy grilled peppers, eggplant salad, taramasalata and houmos, to enjoy in concert with one another. Some of these are only $3.25 a portion. A combo of two may cost as little as $4.95, a combo of three, $6.95. At Kapilyo, patrons discover the joys of eating a leisurely meal composed of many small snacks—and "composing" their meal to suit individual taste.

There are delicious desserts, like creme caramel, baklava and ekmek kadaif—and for those with a sweet tooth that is always young, baklava ice cream. The extensive wine list includes retsina, Kouros and other Greek wines, a wide variety of international wines.

Kapilyo is at 401 Danforth Ave., opposite the Chester subway; telephone 463-4847. They are open from noon until 2 a.m. weekdays, until 4 a.m. Fridays and Saturdays. Visa, Amex and Mastercard are accepted. (There is no wheelchair access to washrooms.)

"King of the Danforth" mantle suits Saul just fine

Arguably as famous as the celebrities he serves, Saul Korman presides over his men' s wear emporium with a personality so big it easily fills the cozy confines of Korry's and spills out onto the beloved Danforth that has been its home for three generations.

From humble beginnings in a tough northern Ontario mining town, where he worked in a movie theatre (an early harbinger of stardom?), Saul later parlayed father Nathan's family clothing business into the Korry's we know today. The Danforth area is now one of Toronto's trendiest, but forty years ago its main attraction to retailers was cheap rent. Korman pumped the resulting savings into advertising and has continued to do so to this day, to such an extent that "three out of four people looking for a suit will think of Korry's", he says. Who would argue?

But reputations are not built on advertising alone; a wonderful merchandise mix, knowledgeable staff and aggressive pricing have earned Korry's a "share of mind" unparalleled in the retail business. Suits are a keynote, of course, and you'll find Versace, Boss, Canali, and other fine makes in a wide range of price points. An ongoing two-for-one suit sale has proved so popular that it now extends to pants, and occasionally other items as well. You can walk out with a mini-wardrobe and still have plenty of change left over for a night of Greektown dining.

Many screen legends have shopped at Korry's, including Jack Lemmon, George C. Scott, Robert Vaughan, and David Carradine. Walk in today, and you'll rub shoulders with the likes of Devon White, Elvis Stojko, and Wendel Clark (though Saul assures you can buy a suit without being traded to Quebec!).

Any men's wear store can sell you designer names, and many offer low prices, but Korry's colour coordination and wardrobe analysis gives him a decided edge. You'll enjoy the advice and seichl of seasoned veterans, plus an unexpected ally – your wife. According to Saul, "Women have more fashion sense than men, so we take their advice very seriously. Besides, who can resist free colour coordination?"

Not surprisingly, Korry's is a destination of choice for special occasion dressing; Saul and his staff (aided and abetted by your better half) will ensure you're outdone neither by the groom nor by your own bar mitzvah boy.

Speaking of boys, Saul wasn't always the silver-tongued orator he is today. The Saul Korman who recently was asked to address the graduating class of the International Fashion Academy is the same "Shlaime" Korman who practically stuttered his way out of Rouyn-Noranda. This acquisition of poise, polish and public acclaim has been his greatest source of satisfaction in business.

With nothing left to prove, Saul still treats each client like he has everything to prove, and has passed the Korman torch to his son Michael . . . sort of. An insatiable love of the business keeps him on the floor and spreading the good word everywhere – on the air and in print – even as Michael gently whispers the dreaded "R" word in his ear.

Don't hold your breath, Michael. The old man's just picking up steam.

At Ascot Mansions, You can afford quality

Shane Baghai is glad people are checking out the competition before buying a condominium at Ascot Mansions, because he prefers informed buyers. Although large numbers of people are visiting this mid-rise project at Leslie and John Sts. in Thornhill, most of those who buy do so on a return trip. They have learned, says Baghai, that Ascot Mansions offers fine quality at a reasonable price. He expects to sell out soon.

This is Baghai's third condominium project, after Watergarden at Bayview and Finch, and York Mills Mansions at Hoggs Hollow. He takes special pride in Ascot because here, for the first time, he can offer reasonably priced condo suites with the fine finishes of a Baghai home. During the past 20 years, while earning a reputation as one of Toronto's finest builders whom only the rich can afford, he has often invited the public to browse through one of his custom homes. Even though most people can not afford custom work, he wants them to have the chance to see it. He has always wanted to build quality homes that were not for the very rich alone.

At Ascot Mansions, he has achieved this goal. Prices range from $126,000 for a 700-sq. ft. one-bedroom suite to $280,000 for a three-bedroom with 1,510 sq. ft. Thirty of these suites are being sold with a guaranteed 6% mortgage for a period of 2 years.

Baghai doubts he will ever be able to match these prices again. After a five-year decline, the market for both new and resale homes is recovering, and pushing prices up. Those who put a deposit on a suite now, however, will be protected from price increases until September 1995, when Ascot Mansions will be ready for occupancy.

The master craftsmen who work on Baghai's luxury homes are working here. Every suite will have marble and tile flooring, marble window sills, custom wood frame doorways and four-and-one-half-inch baseboards. Every suite will have a whirlpool bath, as well as top-of-the-line appliances and kitchen, bathroom and laundry fixtures. Security will be first-class, with cameras in the underground parking areas and 24-hour communication with staff.

To visit the Ascot Mansions sales office, take Bayview Ave. north of Steeles to John St., then turn west on John to Leslie, and watch for the Shane Baghai signs on the northwest corner. Sales hours are 1:00 to 7:00 p.m. Monday to Thursday, 1:00 to 5:00 p.m. Friday, and 11:00 a.m. to 5:00 p.m weekends and holidays.

Singles Registry celebrates two more engagements

It has been just over a year and a half since the Jewish Singles Registry (JSR) was established in Toronto, with highly successful divisions already operating out of Montreal and Ottawa. More than 450 members have signed up in Toronto alone and are taking advantage of an excellent program. Last month alone a total of 167 phone numbers were given out at our office. Meeting someone has never been easier as registration approaches the 500 mark. As of this writing it can be reported that 22 couples are dating seriously, with an additional four couples doing so via Highway 401 between Montreal and Toronto.

Engagement news

There is no better endorsement for a service like the JSR than two people meeting, falling in love and getting married. On June 5, 1994 a couple who were brought together through the pages of our books in the spring of 1993, walked down the aisle. Meanwhile, there are two more engagements to report. This represents yet another illustration why the JSR is the fastest, easiest and most non-threatening way for singles to meet.

The JSR offers members an unlimited number of introductions that they alone select from an extensive bio/photo library of professional men and women of all ages. New members are joining on a weekly basis, many as a result of those already part of the system. Unlike those "promise you everything but deliver next to nothing" expensive matchmaking services, the JSR is a community-based organization which allows members to select for themselves the persons they wish to meet. There's no astrology, no psychic intuition and definitely no mistakes!

For those individuals intent on eliminating the risk factor inherent in blind dating, you can now improve your chances of becoming acquainted with the right people or maybe even the person of your dreams. All it takes is a telephone call to make an appointment and to register as a member.

The JSR is an introduction service like no other. It's honest, straight forward and very affordable. Best of all, there are no unwelcome surprises and because you do the choosing - no date is a blind date. The JSR takes the "blind" out of "blind dating."

Kindertransport a tale of separation, survival

By GERRY MORRIS
Special to The CJN

NEW YORK — Between Kristallnacht in November, 1938, and the outbreak of World War II, Great Britain allowed nearly 10,000 Jewish children to enter the country and escape with their lives; one and a half million perished in the hands of Hitler's Germany.

The children entering Britain, whose ages ranged from a few months to 17 years, had to flee without their parents. It is estimated that approximately 2,500 of these kinder (children) eventually emigrated to Canada and the United States. Transported to a different culture, they encountered a mixture of kindness, indifference and occasional exploitation.

"Kindertransport" was the informal name of the rescue operation, an undertaking in which many organizations and individuals participated.

Kindertransport is the story of one girl's separation from her parents, and, equally important, from her ancestry. A series of flashbacks follow the progress of Eva, a 9-year-old German Jewish girl (Alanna Ubach), who is adopted by a Christian family in Manchester, England.

She grows up thoroughly anglicized, and in time she abandons her Jewishness, her birthplace and her given name, Eva. She becomes Evelyn, a reserved mother who is confronted many years later with her complex past by her own college-age, rebellious daughter (Mary Mara). The girl stumbles on the truth in Evelyn's (Dana Ivey) home in present-day London, and seeks answers to her mother's buried past.

Eva/Evelyn's real father perished in Auschwitz, but her mother, Helga, survives, only to be rejected by Eva when she pleads that they start a new life in America. The confrontation is shattering.

This is a heartrending study of separation and loss by award-winning playwright Diane Samuels. Dana Ivey is perfect as the adult Evelyn. Alanna Ubach gives an extraordinary performance as little Eva. Jane Kaczmarek is powerful and unusually restrained as the camp-surviving mother.

Mary Mara and Dana Ivey in Kindertransport.

The entire proceedings, which move smoothly back and forth between the present and the past, are directed by Abigail Morris with sympathetic understanding.

Appearing for an indefinite run at Manhattan Theatre Club, Stage 1, City Centre, 131 West 55th Street.

Jewish immigrant lifestyle explored

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — It has long been accepted that in the early part of the century, many immigrants to Canada from Europe started out as peddlers, giving them a firm economic base.

Now Deena Nathanson, a PhD candidate at the University of Toronto, has come up with "a social profile" of peddlers in Toronto from 1891 to 1930.

Her essay is found in Canadian Jewish Studies/Etudes Juives Canadiennes, a new publication of the Canadian Jewish Historical Society, edited by Richard Menkis of the Department of Jewish Studies at the University of British Columbia.

Nathanson has examined the lifestyle of 72 Jewish immigrants in Toronto, selected from a larger group of 201 people who peddled there; but only the 72 could be traced in the city directory for 1910.

The peddlers studied lived on Centre Ave. (in downtown Toronto), and Chestnut or Elizabeth St. in the "Ward," an immigrant receiving area in Toronto. Here, inexpensive housing was available, there were good job possibilities nearby and, above all, it was predominantly Jewish. Street life in the Ward, which was referred to as St. John's Shtetl, resembled a European village and the name was fairly accurate, says Nathanson.

The hierarchy that emerged among the 72 individuals studied suggested that most achieved some degree of upward mobility. The first group, at the top of the list, were the entrepreneurs who abandoned peddling at some point and established their own companies, usually in the garment or salvage industries. This group represents 31 per cent of those in the study.

The second group in the pecking order as defined by Nathanson, is the 50 per cent who operated shops or small businesses, although some remained peddlers throughout their careers.

The final group, about 25 per cent, spent most of their careers as travelling salesmen. Although they were regarded as peddlers, travellers traded occupational independence for security, since they worked for specific firms. The members of this "employee class" were not necessarily on a lower economic plane than the second group, but because they were not self-employed, they were given a lower status.

Related to their upward mobility was the move to a new Jewish neighborhood in the Kensington Market area, the major Jewish district until 1930, the final year of the study. But a few moved into more fashionable neighborhoods like the Annex and even Forest Hill Village in the 1920s.

The peddlers established themselves socially by joining Goel Tzedec Congregation (which eventually became Beth Tzedec) on University Ave., just south of Dundas. Goel Tzedec, says Nathanson, could be characterized as the congregation of the "new elite" of Toronto's eastern Jewish community.

It is interesting to note that Goel Tzedec was basically a Lithuanian organization. A number of the peddlers were also members of other congregations more closely related to their European backgrounds. But Goel Tzedec gave them the prestige they sought.

The peddlers also belonged to other types of organizations, such as general benevolent societies and societies with a clear ideological orientation towards the politics of the left.

But most of the individuals studied, says Nathanson, do not appear to have been connected with the Jewish labor movement. A Toronto Hebrew Pedler's (sic) Protective Association was founded about 1910, comprised of people concerned with their own socio-economic advancement. But it was poorly organized, low on funds and generally ineffective. The original members drifted away as soon as they became more financially sound.

An important indication of the financial standing of the peddlers studied was whether or not they operated their business from their homes. Having a business in a location other than where he lived indicated that a proprietor could afford to maintain two buildings.

Nathanson describes Henry Greisman as one of the most successful of the 72 individuals studied. A member of Goel Tzedec, although he was a Galician Jew, he was both a jobber and a peddler. By 1897 he owned all of the properties between 45 and 57 Chestnut St. Later he built a row of houses on Chestnut "and his early real estate ventures were apparently a prelude to later ones." He owned the King Suspender Company until his death in 1938.

Merovitz & Katz in Concert: You've read about Allan Merovitz and Brian Katz in this column before. Merovitz is the lead vocalist of the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band and a gifted actor, playwright and storyteller with more than 30 years of experience. Katz is a guitarist, pianist and composer extraordinaire, known for his intermingling of jazz, classical and folk styles of music. Recently, the two produced Hartzedike-Lider (Heart Songs), an album of wonderful old Yiddish songs such as Umru Mayne (My Unrest), Mayn Rue-Plats (My Resting Place) and Dire-Gelt (Rent Money). A born raconteur, Merovitz's folksy narration weaves a magical spell around the music and Katz's accompaniment is always superb.

The duo is performing at four upcoming concerts. Hear them while enjoying a cabaret buffet at The Artword Centre, 81 Portland Street (in the King & Bathurst area of Toronto), July 28 and 29. Or come to Camp Nyveld, northwest of Toronto, for two sets, at 8 and 9 p.m. on July 30; for directions, call (416) 789-5981 weekdays, (905) 874-9396 weekends. They're also scheduled to perform two sets at the Mezzeth Cafe Restaurant, 681 St. Clair Ave. (at Christie) on August 3, a $6 cover applies. Reservations, 658-5687.

The Big Three At The AGO: The Art Gallery of Ontario has the largest collection of works by Walter Trier, a popular illustrator and cartoonist. The series, called The Meeting of the Big Three, originally appeared in the English magazine Illustrated in 1945. It was inspired by the famous meeting of Churchill, Stalin and Roosevelt at Yalta.

Trier's watercolors are also clever parodies of the styles of famous artists, including Henry Moore, Picasso, Rembrandt and others. Runs July 27 to Oct. 30.

Also at the AGO, an exhibition of prints, drawings and sculptures by such artists as Cezanne, Gauguin, van Gogh, Renoir, Picasso and Matisse opens July 23 for a six-month showing. The works are meant to complement the 85 paintings in the upcoming blockbuster exhibition From Cezanne to Matisse: Great French Paintings from the Barnes Foundation, which is set to open Sept. 17.

Hebrew manuscripts

Sotheby's Sells Hebrew Manuscripts: A collection of 76 Hebrew manuscripts, some 1,000 years old, fetched a total of about $5 million at a Sotheby's auction in London last month. The collection had belonged to the late David Solomon Sassoon (1880-1942), who had assembled one of the world's great collection of Jewish manuscripts. The subjects of the manuscripts covered a magnificent range of Jewish culture and learning — liturgy, history, medicine, law, poetry — over nearly a millenium. The item that drew the largest sum of about $663,000 was a Torah manuscript, decorated with animals and designs, dating from Northern France in the late 13th century. A well-preserved medieval Spanish Bible in a richly decorated binding sold for roughly $619,000.

Sassoon was born of a distinguished family, originally from Baghdad, who became known as the "Rothschilds of the East." His passion for collecting books began at an early age. He acquired his first rare book when he was 8 years old, by exchanging a kite with another boy for a Scroll of Ruth in Arabic. All but four of the 76 manuscripts were bought by private collectors from around the world.

Wiseman blends truth and fiction

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

Simca Kuper

Howie Wiseman

TORONTO — Truth and fiction blended beautifully for Howie Wiseman, a 42-year-old Jewish screenwriter who not only co-wrote a movie filmed in Russia starring Theodore Bikel, but played a cameo role in it himself.

To top it off, Wiseman wrote a one-act comedy about the experience, The Iron Curtain, one of 80 plays in Toronto's recent Fringe Festival, and hopes to remount it later in another theatre.

While filming My Family Treasure near Yalta, Wiseman was surprised to learn they were near Yakatrinislav (now Dneiperpetrovsk)the city where his late grandfathers, Herb Winston and Morris Wiseman of Winnipeg, were born.

The former Winnipeg and Montreal resident, now living in Toronto, brushes off his role in front of the cameras, commenting: "I was the only person left in the Crimea who could speak English who wasn't already in the movie."

My Family Treasure is about a Brooklyn girl seeking a pre-revolutionary fortune in Russia, who captures the heart of a KGB agent whose mission is to foil her quest. It may be available on home video this fall.

The truth is that Wiseman, waiting on tables at night in a Times Square restaurant in New York and pounding a word processor by day, was hustled off to Russia at the last minute in 1991 to rescue the script.

This was at a time of personal crisis in his own life — a break-up with his girlfriend of six years. (That works its way into the script of The Iron Curtain, too.)

In his three weeks in Russia (prior to the abortive Gorbachev coup) Wiseman had to adjust to the Russian director's idea that scenes in Siberia should be shot near Yalta, the Russian Riviera.

In The Iron Curtain, three Jewish actors, Daniel Chercover, Simca Kuper and Tanya Matthews, cavort on the stage in the roles, respectively, of Wiseman, the Brooklyn girl, and the Japanese producer. Wiseman himslf is the play's narrator, his first time on stage.

The Iron Curtain author, son of Manny and Elaine Wiseman, of Winnipeg, is the brother of Gordon Wiseman of Toronto, who wrote Einstein, among other plays, and of Bob Wiseman, a well known musician.

Howie has written a feature film Year of the Flood, based on the experiences of a pioneer Winnipeg Jewish trapper and furrier, and he hopes to find a producer for it. He is a co-writer of Dance Me Outside, the Norman Jewison and Bruce McDonald film soon to be released, and was co-writer and director of Mother of Pearl, a hit of the 1991 Fringe Fstival.

Besides acting in the play, Simca Kuper, daughter of film-maker Jack Kuper, was dramaturge for The Iron Curtain.

Ackerman touches all bases in exploring the nature of love

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

Diane Ackerman

TORONTO — Don't ask Diane Ackerman for advice in matters of the heart.

The author of the recently published A Natural History of Love (Random House $30), in town last month to promote her latest work, may have spent three years studying her subject but says that doesn't make her an expert in love.

"The best book about love would take from birth to death to write," she laughs.

Getting to know Ackerman is hard. Between sips of herbal tea in a Toronto hotel bar, the 40-something author refuses to answer questions about her age, her personal life ("I won't discuss my loved ones in public") or her home in upstate New York. All she will divulge is that she was raised in an non-observant Jewish home.

When it comes to discussing the book, however, Ackerman visibly relaxes. A Natural History of Love is an outgrowth of her earlier work, A Natural History of the Senses, a surprise best-seller in 1990 and the source of an upcoming PBS miniseries.

"Love is packed with great sensations," she explains. "It is a very sensory miracle."

Like its author, who admits to flitting from topic to topic as her curiosity is aroused, A Natural History of Love attempts to cover a lot of ground in its examination of the different types of love, the chemistry of love, and love throughout the ages. As a result, the self-described "panoramic" approach is at times shallow.

But the book does reveal the depths of Ackerman's skills as a poet and as a naturalist, especially in those sections where she draws parallels between human and animal behavior. "Humans are my favorite animal," she confesses.

But for all of the scientific and historical proof that love is older than the hills, Ackerman cautions against believing love works itself out.

"Love works best when people become friends first," she says. "It takes a certain amount of application and hard work. It's not a thunderbolt."

BOOKS

By BERNARD BASKIN

The Waterworks by E. L. Doctorow (Random House $23.00 US)

At 63, with seven novels, a collection of stories and a play to his credit, E. L. Doctorow must be ranked among America's most noteworthy and controversial writers. He has achieved both commercial success and literary acclaim.

Much of his work is a curious mixture of historical reality and fiction. In Ragtime (1978) personalities such as Freud, Houdini and Emma Goldman have unlikely encounters with the author's own created characters. Billy Bathgate (1989) includes Thomas E. Dewey, special public prosecutor in New York City during the 1930s and the gangster Dutch Schultz among the personae. The Book of Daniel (1971), Doctorow's most overtly Jewish work, has as its protagonist Daniel Isaacson, whose parents, modeled on Ethel and Julius Rosenberg, were convicted and executed as spies during the early 1950s.

The setting for his new novel is Manhattan in 1871, the age of the infamous and corrupt Tweed Ring that controlled the city in the wake of the dislocation and trauma of the Civil War. The book's narrator is a newspaper editor who becomes alarmed when his favorite freelance writer, young and talented Martin Pemberton, suddenly disappears.

Martin is the estranged son of Augustus Pemberton — widely respected and outwardly pious, but a secret slave trader and unfeeling plutocrat. Although Augustus has died and been properly buried, his son, prior to his disappearance, gives several breathless accounts of having seen his father on two occasions aboard municipal carriages.

The troubled editor eager to unravel the mystery of the Pembertons — father and son — enlists a motley crew of accomplices, among them Martin's distraught fiancee and an honest member of the police department.

The unfolding plot can only be regarded as Gothic melodrama, not meant to be taken seriously. Augustus and a group of older men have turned over their entire estates to a brilliant but weird scientist-doctor, corrupted by the claims of scientific progress, who has promised to give them the gift of eternal life. Hidden from society, the aged coterie maintains a vegetal existence sustained by fluids extracted from children who are kept in a secluded orphanage.

Doctorow among most noteworthy writers

In the end Martin is found close to death's door in a fetid dungeon, his father finally dies, the doctor is incarcerated as dangerous and insane and the happy lovers are reunited.

This amalgum of horror and romance allows the author to dwell on the meaning of good and evil, loyalty and betrayal, greed and altruism, love and despair, and the illusion of progress.

More than anything else The Waterworks is a marvellous recreation of New York City a century ago. "At night the flaming stacks of the foundries along the river cast torchlight like seed over the old wharves and packing sheds. Cinderous locomotives rode right down the streets. Coal stoked the steamships and the ferries. The cookstoves in our homes burned coal, and on a winter morning without wind, black plumes rose from the chimneys in orderly rows, like the shimmering citizens of a necropolis."

New York City pulsates with life and change, a teeming metropolis in which everything is possible. This novel, unusual in tone, texture and theme, is another Doctorow surprise.

Musicians plan Yiddish CD

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two Toronto musicians have arranged some traditional Yiddish songs to an upbeat tempo with a touch of jazz, samba and the blues, without losing their haunting appeal.

The lilting tenor voice of Allan Merovitz and the guitar and piano playing of Brian Katz enliven their demo tape Hartzedike-Lider (Heartsongs), which they hope to bring out on a compact disc this year.

But if you want to appreciate their artistry fully, Merovitz and Katz should be in your living room, doing their songs in person, for Merovitz' stories on tape, for all their relevance and humor, interrupt the flow of the music.

The lead vocalist with the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band, Merovitz is renowned as a storyteller as well.

Introducing Dire-Gelt (Rent Money), he talks about his grandmother and how she fed all the hungry children in the neighborhood with her 15 per cent take off the top of the gambling she allowed in her parlor.

One of the children she fed, now a businessman with a chauffeur, returns every few months with a gift of $200, her rent money.

Blues beat

The Yiddish verse of this song, swung to a blues beat, is harder-edged than Merovitz' anecdote, and reflects the harsh realities of immigrants being put out on the street with their beds, if they don't pay the rent.

The Maurice Rosenfeld song Mayn Rue-Plats (My Resting Place) is given a beautiful arrangement by Katz and an uplifting vocal by Merovitz. The latter introduces the song with the story of an observant immigrant who started cleaning up his work station Friday afternoon in preparation for the Sabbath.

"Listen, you greenhorn," the foreman shouts, "in Canada everybody works all day Friday." But the worker leaves the foreman and his job behind as he walks out.

The Yiddish verse reads:

"Don't look for me,
Where birds are singing,
Where chains are ringing
That is my resting place,
That is my resting place."

There is a jazzed-up version of the ubiquitous Di Grineh Kuzine with vocals by Katz and Merovitz.

You will not find me there,
You will not find me there my love
I am a slave,

Yam Lid (Sea Song) is dedicated by Merovitz to his love of the Maritime provinces of Canada and his arrangement of the 12th century piece has all the rollicking swing of a sea shanty. He also uses the story to trace his own Jewish roots through the Jewish composers of a bygone era.

LADY, BE GOOD!

Richard Binsley and Karen Skidmore star in the Shaw Festival production of Lady, Be Good, at the Royal George Theatre in Niagara-on-the-Lake until Oct. 16. The play's music and lyrics are by George and Ira Gershwin.

Bookseller to the People of the Book

By NETTY GROSS
Special to The CJN

ISRAEL — Eri Steimatzky sells 40 per cent of all Hebrew language books published in Israel and 100 per cent of all foreign language books imported to Israel.

His 110 white and green stores are in every shopping mall, major pedestrian thoroughfare and five-star hotel in the country.

By comparison, total U.S. sales of major American booksellers account for less than 20 per cent of retail U.S. book sales.

"For the Western world our sale percentages are very high," says Steimatzky, 51, the company president. "And they are only increasing."

By virtue of his extensive inventory, housed in a 70,000 square foot warehouse in Bnei Brak, and his well-oiled distribution system, Steimatzky is also a wholesaler of both Hebrew and international reading material, including newspapers and magazines, to some 1,500 newsstands. Some of his best customers are, to their chagrin, his competitors (other retail bookstores).

Steimatzky's is also a publisher in its own right, having published the political memoirs of Chaim Herzog, Yitzhak Rabin, Teddy Kollek, Golda Meir and Ezer Weizman.

But the catalogue of powerful names doesn't affect Steimatzky. He says what impresses him most about a book is how many copies it sold. The political heavyweights may decide the country's fate, he says, but he decides what the country reads.

For competing Israeli publishers, this makes the super-successful Steimatzky easy to hate. They characterize his octopus-like presence on the Israeli book scene this way: "If Steimatzky doesn't carry the book, it's dead in the water."

According to Eli Granit, president of Keter-Granit, a 20-outlet bookstore chain, the depiction of Steimatzky as a hard-driving business mogul who plays to win is accurate.

"But there is another side to all this," said Granit, whose chain lives in Steimatzky's shadow.

His competitor, he says, is a ruthless businessman who "threatens and bullies" and uses his dominant position to "stifle the publishing industry in Israel. Everyone is afraid to complain about him because it's known that he takes revenge. He dictates prices and tastes."

Bookseller to the People of the Book is a role which Steimatzky inherited from what he calls his late father's "unabashed imperialism."

In 1925, Russian-born Yechezkel Steimatzky, 25, arrived in Palestine via Berlin, where he had worked with revisionist leader Ze'ev Jabotinsky on developing a Hebrew atlas.

By 1948 he had bookstores in Beirut (which operated until 1956), Damascus, Baghdad, Cairo and Alexandria.

"King Farouk [of Saudi Arabia] was a customer," notes Steimatzky, who entered the business in 1963 when the chain had four stores.

Twenty years later the count was up to 36 stores, and in the last decade alone 66 stores were added.

Spinning equally fast, though in the opposite direction, were the rest of Israel's bookstore chains. The Keter, Motza, Carta, Lyric and Modan chains (the latter operated 40 stores) all closed.

In an attempt to break Steimatzky's domination of the market in 1986, the giant Keter publishing house entered the retail business using a formula that mirrored Steimatzky's. They opened spacious, well-stocked stores in 38 prime locations.

The jewel in their crown was a swanky, three-storey flagship store trimmed in glass, brass and wood on Tel Aviv's Dizengoff Street.

Six years later, on the verge of collapse and unable to maintain a stable inventory of books, Keter mailed its last rent check. According to Keter's lease, they had to return the store to its original state and strip it of all its expensive fittings.

Eri Steimatzky

But the cruelest cut of all for Keter was the new tenant at the pricey Dizengoff location — Steimatzky.

In 1991, Granit acquired control of Keter's stores (now called Keter-Granit) and he remains Steimatzky's sole competing bookstore chain.

Despite the rigor mortis of the rest of the retail book business in Israel, Steimatzky shows no signs of slowing down.

Jerusalem's colossal new shopping mall in Malha boasts three Steimatzky stores, and in Tel Aviv, within a radius of two miles from the prime Dizengoff Centre, Steimatzky now operates four major stores. In Haifa, aside from the university bookshops, all the bookstores are Steimatzky's.

Independently-owned bookstores — there are 300 of them — are, says one industry insider, "always under financial pressure. They always hurry to return unsold books to publishers, keep a low stock and every month are chasing down their checks."

"I am very proud of what we have accomplished — we worked very hard to get where we are," says Steimatzky, who maintains a low profile and rarely agrees to media interviews.

Steimatzky is well-versed in dealing with the M-word — monopoly. "To be declared an effective monopoly in Israel," says Steimatzky, "you have to control 50 per cent of the market. When it comes to locally published books, we don't. Nor do I want to. I am not anxious to have the government breathing down my neck, examining my books."

While Steimatzky's has exclusive licensing arrangements with international publishers obligating them to sell only to Steimatzky, it does not stop Israelis from directly approaching the publisher, purchasing a quantity of books and shipping them to Israel.

But few bookshop owners can do this. "They lack the line of credit, the financial strength to absorb 'mistakes,' " says Steimatzky. "It's easier to purchase the books from us."

Granit disputes Steimatzky on both counts. "On the local scene, he definitely is in a position to dictate prices and does. Publishers are always on the defensive, subject to his price demands.

"On the international front," Granit says, "Steimatzky has repeatedly threatened foreign publishers, warning that if they supply his competitors, he will refuse to purchase from them. I have letters to prove this."

In 1987, Bronfman Inc., Steimatzky's tough competitor in the imported newspaper and magazine market, went bankrupt. After a complex series of behind-the-scenes dealings, Steimatzky picked up Bronfman's clients.

Despite his total domination of the newspaper and magazine market, which accounts for 20 per cent of his profits, it is not considered a monopoly.

"People have subscriptions," says Steimatzky, "which gives them the product at a cheaper price. We are not the only source of supply."

While Steimatzky acknowledges the feeling of animosity toward him due to his commanding position, he chalks it up to professional sour grapes.

"It's a combination of envy and a fear of dependency. I don't think people have a reason to be afraid. It wouldn't be wise on our part to apply inappropriate pressure. We certainly don't come off as brutally we we could."

When it comes to his success, Steimatzky says he succeeded where others have failed because his competitors did not understand the Israeli customer.

"Our competition, it turns out, is not other bookstores," he says. "Rather it is candy shops, household good emporiums and flower shops. Israelis frequent bookstores to buy gifts as well as purchase books for themselves."

Business Briefs

Index Jumps 1.2 Per Cent

JERUSALEM — The Consumer Price Index jumped 1.2 per cent in May, as housing prices continued to soar.

Rahamim Ozama, head of the Central Bureau of Statistics' Price Division, estimated that inflation is now running at 14 per cent annually, based on the first five months of the year.

Most economists were caught by surprise, expecting housing prices to moderate in the aftermath of the stock market's slump. They thought the drop in investors wealth would curb their appetite for housing.

However, "housing keeps striking back," said Jonathan Katz, head of Economic Modelling and Forecasting.

Housing prices rose 2.3 per cent last month, as apartment prices increased by 2.5 per cent and rents by 1.2 per cent. Housing contributed 40 per cent of the index rise last month.

Peres Visits Europe

JERUSALEM — Foreign Minister Shimon Peres recently held key meetings in Luxembourg in an attempt to persuade Britain and France to stop blocking full Israeli participation in European research and development programs.

Senior officials said Israel considers such participation vital for the future of the country's hi-tech industry. They hinted that Britain and France fear Israeli industrial competition in hi-tech areas, and therefore favor a more restrictive "case-by-case cooperation."

Oded Eiran, a Foreign Ministry economic specialist, warned that Israel's balance of trade with Europe will steadily worsen unless the European Union (EU) adopts a more flexible policy towards Israel.

In 1993, Israel imported $10 billion from Europe and exported only $4.4 billion, leaving a deficit of $5.6 billion.

Treaty To Take Effect in 1995

JERUSALEM — The Israel-U.S. treaty to prevent double taxation is expected to take effect next year and not this year, as originally planned, Income Tax Commissioner Doron Levy said recently.

Levy said the delay is due to the issue of access to bank account information, which must still be clarified.

The source of the delay is a U.S. request for written assurances that Israel will make available information on local bank accounts to help catch tax evaders.

The provision causing the commotion requires the tax authorities of both countries to exchange information for uncovering tax avoidance.

U.S. officials were particularly concerned that since the Israeli tax authorities have limited information on bank accounts, Americans with bank accounts here would be able to escape U.S. scrutiny.

After the question was raised, following the Income Tax Authority's review, Levy determined there is no reason Israel could not provide bank account information, even if the information is not readily available in the authority's files.

Levy noted, however, that the information would only be provided in specific circumstances. "There has to be some justification for the provision of such information," he said. "We are not talking about computer printout lists of all Americans that live here or Israelis living in the U.S."

BIZ BRIEFS

Recovering Embezzled Funds

BERLIN — Germany's highest court has ruled that the Jewish community here cannot sue a French bank to recover reparation payments embezzled by a former leader of the community.

In April, the Federal Court of Justice in the southwestern city of Karlsruhe dismissed a suit brought by the Central Council of Jewish Communities in Germany against the French bank Societe Generale-Elsass.

As a result of the decision, the Jewish community will not be able to recover any of the funds embezzled by Werner Nachmann, the late president of the council.

Nachmann, a businessman who died in 1988, had allegedly transferred through the French bank to his own private accounts some $13.4 million of compensation payments paid by the German government to Holocaust survivors.

The fund was to be used to distribute one-time payments to Jewish victims of Nazism in Eastern Europe who had been unable to make the 1965 application deadline for payments.

Credit Card Rates Stabilize

OTTAWA — Most credit card interest rates have not changed since the beginning of the year despite fluctuations in short-term interest rates, Industry Minister John Manley said recently in releasing the Quarterly Credit Card report.

The minister also pointed to new options being offered by some of the companies. "Card holders can take advantage of bonus points toward the purchase of a new car, a new home or air miles," Manley said. "Credit card issuers are competing for customers right now and it is most important that customers carefully assess whether their present card is offering the best options for them."

He encouraged consumers to shop carefully for the best combination of interest rates, fees and services when considering the use of any card.

This week The CJN features . . . Parkwood Central

By LORI DENNIS

TORONTO — So much has changed in the North American car industry since Paul Stern joined Parkwood Central in the early '80s. For the most part, he is pleased with what he sees.

As the new owner of the centrally located Toronto GM dealership which has been in operation for the past 37 years, Stern is excited about the changes that have taken place in the domestic car market since the recession hit.

"We've matched the Japanese and the Germans in terms of the quality of our automobiles. That's a remarkable turnaround for an industry that was potentially on its way out just a few years ago," says Stern.

There are many factors contributing to this newfound success — a level of success that boasts high customer satisfaction and now places North American car manufacturers as the lowest cost producers in the world.

The first and most important change that took place was a shift in goals. While the ultimate industry objective used to be to achieve the highest volume, the focus is now on service.

"The customer really does come first. From offering a 'perfect product' to proper pricing to ultimate warranty packages, our primary goal is to make sure that the customer is happy so he'll come back and see us again," says Stern.

At Parkwood Central, they are achieving that goal with a customer satisfaction index of 94 per cent and higher.

But the picture was not always so rosy. In 1991, when Stern bought the company from the Davis family, everything was high — the rent, the salaries, the prices. Everything but the profit margin.

He quickly downsized the dealership to half its size, keeping the customer-oriented sales staff. Within two and a half years, he managed to double its sales in a down market, "not by being the cheapest but by providing the best service," he says.

One of GM's new marketing directions for the '90s is "value pricing." It's a one-price system (not price fixing), where the dealer puts forward the best price they can offer — which is always lower than the manufacturer's list price.

This approach eliminates the time and stress associated with negotiating and allows both the salesperson and the customer to focus on the key issues — quality of product and service. Value pricing applies to parts and service as well, which means that the dealers are competitive with and sometimes less expensive than other garages.

"We've experienced a tremendous shake-up. But at the same time, we've made a tremendous comeback. And we did it not by stealing ideas from others but by implementing systems that work, such as teamwork, discipline and high standards," explains Stern.

Canada, Israel may exchange construction technology

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — Canadian Public Works Minister David Dingwall says he hopes to sign an agreement of understanding with Israel to facilitate an exchange of construction technology between the two countries.

Dingwall made the statement after meeting this month with his Israeli counterpart, Housing Minister Benyamin Ben-Eliezer.

Dingwall, who was on an official visit to Israel at Ben-Eliezer's invitation, said Canada and Israel also plan to explore the idea of modifying building standard requirements.

A change in the current regulations could facilitate more Canadian building material exports to Israel. Such goods must currently undergo a costly procedure in order to meet Israeli buiding standards.

The change in regulations discussed by the two ministers would allow the import of Canadian construction products as long as they meet Canadian building standards.

Similarly, Israeli exports to Canada would have to meet Israeli building standards and not Canadian ones, as is now the case.

Dingwall said he invited Ben-Eliezer to Canada later this year and hoped that agreements on these issues could be signed then.

Dingwall also invited Palestinians to visit Canada in order to see firsthand how Canada supplies housing in remote and densely-populated communities.

"I think the Palestinians could learn a lot from our experience," said Dingwall, following his meeting with Zakariya al-Ara, who holds the housing portfolio in the Palestinian Authority.

The minister added that Canada would be willing to train Palestinians in the areas of housing and infrastructure.

Attention Campers

TORONTO — Don't just write, send a care package!

As campers, Justin Beber and Andrew Temes loved getting packages from home. Older now, but nonetheless still enthusiastic, they have started their own business called CareMail.

The two MBA students decided to create their own summer employment by providing care packages for campers of all ages who are attending Jewish overnight camp.

"We both have extensive experience in the summer camp industry, which helped us in pinpointing a niche in the market which had yet to be tapped," agree Beber and Temes, citing the MBA program at York for the tools and confidence it has given them in developing their business plan.

The packages have been designed as an alternative to a simple letter. CareMail makes it easy for parents and grandparents to send their children and grandchildren a package with a specialized message.

Different packages are arranged on a weekly basis, catering to a specific age group of boys or girls (ages 7-11 and 12-15).

Contents will include useful items such as sun block, pens and toothbrushes; and campers will especially love the fun items like teddy bears, sportscards, comic books and bandanas.

The $25 packages also include a personalized message from the sender, a postcard (stamped and pre-addressed to the sender so children can write a thank you), an up-to-date camp bulletin with puzzles, trivia and TV updates.

Temes notes that "an attractive feature of the CareMail concept is its adaptability to a wide variety of markets."

In fact, Temes and Beber plan to carry the business into September with care packages designed specifically for students away from home. They have also considered other variations of the concept, such as gift packages for weekends at the cottage or cheer-ups for those in the hospital.

For more information, call CareMail at (416) 760-5445.

A wealth of hi-tech know-how

By CARL ALPERT
Special to The CJN

HAIFA — Israel is having difficulty absorbing — in a relatively short time — the vast wealth of scientific and engineering know-how which has come from the former Soviet Union.

Yet a great deal is filtering through, influencing industrial and high tech developments and being absorbed in our universities.

Much depends, too, on the personality and initiative of the Russians themselves. Some accept their new fate and sweep streets. Some compromise and take jobs in other occupations. And some insist on thinking big — bigger even than Israel.

One such group here in the greater Haifa area has mobilized a team which has set its sights on billion dollar prospects in the wide world. If talent, imagination, ambition and initiative count for anything, this group, called the Israel Inventive Centre for Advanced Composite Materials (ISCOM) may yet succeed.

The moving spirit of ISCOM is Dr. Yaacov Epstein, author of six books, almost 100 scientific articles and holder of over 50 patent registered in Russia, the United States, Japan, Israel and various European countries. His associates have an almost equally impressive background.

Their field of specialization: development of technologies for producing advanced composite materials and structures, and their application in aircraft, transport, military and industrial buildings.

Much of this enters new areas of technology. We should remember that, despite all the belittling of Soviet science, it is they who launched the first Sputnik and showed the world the way to space exploration — a field in which they were overtaken only because of the vaster resources of the West.

A typical project of ISCOM is the development of an innovative system for drilling and pumping of oil from the floor of the sea without the need for the sea platforms now in use, which are both expensive and dangerous. The system can be assembled in shipyards, conveyed in conventional ships to the site of the prospective underwater oil fields, and installed in a few hours, without the help of divers or submarine robots.

The trend today is towards oil exploration in the deep seas, but it has been held back by the costs. Experts project that in the next ten years the market for equipment and services in this area will run from 40 to 50 billion dollars.

Under the system proposed by the new Israelis, costs of the oil can be reduced to a little more than two dollars a barrel, as against the seven to thirteen dollars per barrel of oil produced by existing platform methods.

The inventive ex-Russians churn out other proposals based on their technology, for the production of non-metallic (or composite) materials. Among those are containers (tanks or boilers) which are light in weight, can withstand great pressure, do not rust, and have a long life span. The same material can be used for bodies of trucks, buses, railway cars and modular buildings.

Any millionaires out there who have vision? ISCOM and Yaacov Epstein can be addressed at Industrial Moshav Tal El, 25167, Israel.

Local branch announces the creation of an Israeli desk

BY STEPHANIE CHAPMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Deloitte Touche Tohmatsu International, one of the world's largest services firms recently announced the addition of their member firm in Israel.

Igal Brightman & Co. will become part of the global team immediately.

"We are pleased to be the first of the major accounting firms to have a full member firm in Israel," said Leonard Barkin, national director of marketing in Canada.

"On behalf of Deloitte & Touche, we are proud to announce the introduction of our Israel desk, chaired by Leon Bleiwas, a partner in our North York office," Barkin said.

Bleiwas stated in a recent press release: "The Brightman firm is well-known to many of our U.S. and Canadian partners, having had a close working relationship, particularly with our New York office, for many years — we are excited by the business prospects for a similar Canadian-Israeli alliance.

"With the peace process under way between Israel and its Arab neighbors, Israel enters a new economic era of increased foreign investment including escalated commerce and industry," Bleiwas said, adding that the country is strategically positioned to act as a bridge to Europe, Asia and Africa.

Igal Brightman & Co. is one of the largest firms in Israel. Their client list includes many companies whose securities are traded on the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange (TASE) and in the U.S. securities market.

In order to accommodate Canadian queries about how to invest in Israel, the firm has published a guide entitled Manual for the Investor in Israel. The purpose of the guide is to provide Canadian clients with an introductory survey of the Israeli economy.

In this latest edition, the company has "attempted to furnish an up-to-date overview of the important economic, legal, accounting and tax factors to be considered by the potential investor in Israel."

The manual — well-written, brief and easy-to-understand — is available upon direct request from the Canadian firm.

Correction

The article that appeared in the July 21 paper on the fashion page under the headline Store offers free consulting service to plus-size women, contained incorrect information.

Jo-Anne Walter purchased the boutique five months ago although the establishment itself has been operating for eight years.

As well, Walter decided to make the purchase when she realized that The Answer Salon would be filling a niche in the plus-size clothing market.

FOCUS ON PERSONAL FINANCES

FIRST IN A FOUR-PART SERIES

When the Canadian economy bit the dust in mid-1990, no one could have forecast how long nor how deep this "economic downturn" would last.

When politicians and economists finally admitted, and perhaps submitted, to the "R" word, things went from bad to worse.

Today, however, these same forecasters are using the "R" word to signify recovery and while many taxpayers wait for that recovery to trickle down, it seems to be the perfect time to address the health of personal finances.

Mired in recession for close to four years, personal finances have taken a beating and now, perhaps more than ever, it is important to talk to financial advisors, investors and tax specialists to ensure maximum results.

The CJN has enlisted the services of four professionals who hail from the world of finance to assess the finances of several families that represent a cross-section of the public.

This is the first of a four-part series. The people featured in the articles are real but their names have been changed to protect their identities.

As well, the advice given pertains only to the people in those situations and readers should contact their own financial advisors to obtain information for themselves.

By WARREN BALDWIN
Special to The CJN

Warren Baldwin B.A., R.F.P., is group vice-president at T.E. Financial Ltd. The firm, which has offices across Canada, is the largest fee-only financial planning firm in the country.

Dear Debra and Joel:

It was a pleasure to meet with you to discuss the details of your financial situation. With Debra's solid base of professional income for the next five to seven years until retirement, and Joel's indexed pension together with his income from his self-employment, your retirement picture appears to be quite secure.

Further, the fact that your house is paid for and that you have always maintained a careful budget and a relatively frugal lifestyle, will ensure that your capital accumulation over the next five to seven years should be quite dramatic. It was apparent from our discussion that there are numerous areas that can easily be fine-tuned to provide you with a more efficient system to manage your finances and investments to enhance the accumulation for a secure financial retirement.

ESTATE PLANNING

As neither of you have Wills nor Powers of Attorney it is crucial that these be obtained at your ealiest possible convenience. I am delighted to hear that you have booked an appointment with your lawyer in the next couple of weeks to initiate this critical documentation. To ensure that the process is most efficient, give some thought to sketching out your desires before you meet with the lawyer so that he or she may more effectively capture these items on paper and your wills may be completed expeditiously. In addition, you should both have Powers of Attorney in favor of each other to ensure that, in the event of a serious medical problem or mental incompetency for any reason, the other would be able to deal with the financial affairs. Debra, as you are familiar with the medical care system, you may also wish to have a personal care Power of Attorney (sometimes referred to as a "living will") prepared for both you and Joel at the same time.

INCOME TAX

It is apparent that you have been doing a good job of preparing the Income Tax Returns up to date. With Joel's new business venture as a self-employed artist, the area gets far more technical.

It is recommended that you obtain the guide for business income from Revenue Canada to use in conjunction with the guide for Artist Income. As well, a good book on tax preparation would also be strongly recommended. You should look into a computer program for tax preparation to install on your home computer so that you can facilitate the preparation and modelling of the business income schedule that will relate to Joel's tax return for 1995.

You should ensure that all records are kept and as many receipts obtained as possible for any business-related expenses. The accounting for these "bits and pieces" should be captured relatively soon after the fiscal year end, while the events of the year are still fresh in your mind. This approach will facilitate the proper filing and reporting of the income in future tax years.

RRSPS

The structure of your RSPs is relatively good at this point in time. With a 60-40 mix of assets in the self-directed RSPs reflecting equity and balanced funds to fixed income investments, you are tending to lean in favor of a more "growth-oriented" investor.

You should ensure that the cash currently available for investment (approximately $25,000) is utilized as soon as possible to maximize your RSP contributions for 1994. Debra can contribute an additional $4,000 for her 1994 regular contribution, Joel can contribute an additional $6,000 for his pension roll over to a spousal RRSP, and Debra, you will be eligible for a contribution of up to $8,000 as a step towards the over contribution limit that you can then use towards your 1995 deductible RSP contribution.

The total of these contributions is $18,000 which leaves only $7,000 left out of the cash available to reinvest. Joel could contribute $8,000 to the spousal RRSP as his over contribution (this would be deductible based on current carry forward RRSP room and future earned RRSP room).

RETIREMENT PLANNING

Joel's pension is joint and survivor 100 per cent and indexed; this is fixed and is likely the most effective way to have this pension delivered in any case. Debra's RSPs will accumulate dramatically over the next five to seven years — assuming all contributions are made to date, and assuming that the maximum contribution is made for the next seven years, and assuming that the RSPs only grow at a modest rate of 8 per cent annual compound, the total value will be about $175,000 at your age 65.

Naturally, this will generate a nice base of retirement income in your hands at fairly low tax rates.

Joel is receiving his CPP and has triggered it early, which is generally considered to be an excellent idea. As Joel may be eligible for a pension from the Great Britain Pension Plan, he should write to them in order to ascertain his eligibility and their requirements for triggering such a payment.

Debra should obtain a statement of CPP earnings to ensure that you have a correct and up-to-date idea of the earnings that CPP is going to use to establish your eligibility for pension. In the event that there is an error in the statement of earnings it is far more appropriate to attempt to correct that error today, rather than waiting until age 65. Once Debra is receiving her CPP you can "level" the CPP for both of you by splitting the payments equally between yourselves.

ASSET MIX

A review of your asset strategy at this point indicates that your structure is not far off base as you are currently approximately 40-60 per cent invested in the equity markets. You should complete a detailed review of your actual asset mix currently, before investing any future funds in the equity markets.

Our calculations indicate that you are more typically a balanced investor, based on your proximity to retirement and financial ratios as well as your somewhat conservative investment philosophy. The current "mix" for a balanced investor is 5 per cent in cash and equivalents, 55 per cent in fixed income investments and only 40 per cent in equity investments.

On the other hand, a growth investor is currently 10 per cent cash, 30 per cent fixed income and 60 per cent equities. With a large investment position about to be placed and significant future investments to be made over the next five to seven years, your asset mix must be monitored closely and maintained within the apropriate guidelines.

INVESTMENT AQUISITIONS

For the equity portion of your portfolio nothing is better than a mutual fund to provide you with the ease of management and broad diversification of your asset base. However, the acquisition of mutual funds is fraught with many charges and fees that you should review.

Normally, our recommendation is to acquire "no-load" mutual funds (that is, no front end fee or rear end fee) or to acquire "load" mutual funds with the front end acquisition charge option negotiated to no more than two per cent. High front end acquisition fees (in other words, loads in excess of two per cent), and deferred sales charges should be avoided.

The other key component to keep in mind when purchasing a mutual fund is the management expense ratio. A number of mutual funds have management expense ratios of less than 1½ per cent. Many are below two per cent, and the ones that are in excess of 2½ per cent do seem somewhat excessive. A high management expense ratio can be somewhat of a drag on the performance of your mutual fund investment.

You should utilize the 20 per cent "foreign content" to the maximum in the mutual fund area before you branch into Canadian mutual funds. To the extent that you wish to "leverage" your foreign content you may wish to select some of the "Canadian" mutual funds that feature a 20 per cent foreign content component. Remember that mutual funds are generally very easy to use for a broad degree of diversification, not only within the mutual fund itself, but by diversifying from one fund manager to another simply by maintaining lower participation levels with the different fund companies.

With respect to the fixed income component of your portfolio, we would normally look to either GIC investments or better yet, strip coupons for the short to medium term. With current interest rates being somewhat volatile, a selection of "staggered" strips or GICs placed over two, three and four years may be a most attractive strategy. This will ensure that your rate of return is a nice average and will also ensure that you have funds available for reinvestment at regular points in the future.

The only asset you have outside your RSP for investment currently is Joel's life insurance. Generally, this should be reviewed every couple of years to ensure that it still meets your investment guidelines and is performing in an adequate fashion compared to your other investment vehicles. Remember that Joel's pension payable on a joint and survivor basis is simply another form of life insurance.

You expressed some frustration at having so much cash in the bank and not having had it invested more effectively. One very simple method to ensure that this is not a continuing problem in the future would be to initiate a pre-authorized checking program (PAC) in favor of a money market mutual fund.

The advantage of the money market fund is that generally the price of the fund will not vary from $10 and the yield is quite high relative to a standard bank account.

For example, many money market funds currently pay about five per cent while bank accounts pay something around one per cent. The strategy would be to assess the average level of potential monthly savings that you and Joel might expect to see and initiate a PAC in favor of a money market fund in order that the accumulation occurs in a higher interest environment than simply in a savings account. Once the asset base in the money market fund reaches a significant level, say, $5,000 to $10,000, then you could initiate a transfer to a more long-term investment vehicle.

The PAC concept is an extremely effective method of forced savings and does facilitate building assets to transfer into an investment portfolio. If you wish to be more aggressive about the PAC concept, the PAC could be set up directly in favor of an equity mutual fund, in order to take advantage of market fluctuations and the dollar-cost-averaging approach to purchasing units of the mutual fund. Your "asset mix" should always be kept in mind for any investing strategy.

Generally, we would not recommend the acquisition at this point of either a bond fund or a mortgage fund since the volatility of interest rates will potentially depress the value of these funds. Since your assets in the RSP in any case are more a long-term position, the strip coupon or GIC approach would no doubt be much more geared to the kind of horizons that you are going to be dealing with.

I trust that the above summary of recommendations will be helpful to you both in order to maximize your position for retirement.

Next Week: Yaron Haik of the Richardson Greenshield Richmond Hill office will use his financial expertise to examine and advise a retired couple on their investments.

A 'positive' experience

By STEPHANIE CHAPMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

In order to determine Debra and Joel's assessment of their financial planning experience, The CJN conducted a follow-up interview with them.

TORONTO — Both Debra and Joel agreed that the experience was "very positive" and said that Warren Baldwin had left them with a "fund of knowledge" that is useable and practical.

When Joel opted to take early retirement, the couple did attend the company's seminar offered with that decision; this gave them some prior knowledge of what was involved in the planning process.

At the time, Debra said, she was horrified when she realized the number of employees who accepted the package, even though they had no concept of financial planning.

Citing this as one of the reasons why people are running into financial trouble after they retire, Debra said professionals should be "getting to those people long before retirement to educate them."

She noted that of the 200 employees who were offered early retirement, 150 accepted the offer. Out of that number, Debra said only five families actually invested their money.

Debra noted two reasons people may have for not approaching a planner. First, many don't know where to start, and second, many perceive such a service as an invasion of privacy.

"Many don't want to admit that they bring home $5,000 a month and spend $10,000," she asid.

For themselves, Debra and Joel said there were no surprises. They had given themselves a time limit of six months after Joel's retirment to get their affairs in order.

As far as their wills are concerned, Debra notes that she called the Lawyer Referral Service which is listed in the yellow pages, in order to obtain information about a legal office located near them. That's a good way to start, she said.

As well, the couple agree that they will visit a financial planner every two years to ensure that their finances remain on track.

The News in Brief

B'nai Brith Meets Argentine Consul

TORONTO — Officials of B'nai Brith Canada last week met with Argentina's consul general in the wake of the Buenos Aires bombing, and urged Argentina to take swift action against those responsible.

The meeting with Argentine consul general Betina P. de Fonseca outlined B'nai Brith's response to the attack, in which the death toll may reach 100. Also discussed was the collection of funds to aid victims' families.

BBC said the meeting was "open and supportive" and praised the Argentine government for its swift condemnation of the bombing.

Also last week, BBC called on Ottawa to beef up security at all Canadian points of entry in the wake of the bombing and the apparent bomb attack on private jet carrying several prominent members of Panama's Jewish community.

Canadian Jewish Congress urged that Jews across the country offer prayers during last Shabbat for those killed and injured in the bombing.

In an open letter to Argentina's Jewish community, CJC president Irving Abella expressed Canadian Jewry's deepest sympathies.

Poll Shows Israeli Gloom...

RAMAT GAN — More than half of Israeli Jews do not believe a new era of Middle East regional peace and cooperation is dawning, according to a new poll.

The poll, commissioned by the Begin-Sadat (BESA) Centre for Strategic Studies at Bar-Ilan University, showed support for the exchange of part of the Golan Heights for peace with Syria increased by 10 per cent over last year, to 45 per cent.

However, more than 50 per cent of the 1,149 Israeli Jews polled were skeptical that peace agreements with either Syria or the Palestinians will resolve Arab-Israeli conflicts.

"Israelis do not at all believe that a new Middle East is about to emerge in the wake of accords with either the PLO or Syria," said Prof. Efraim Inbar, director of the BESA Centre.

...But Most Palestinians Upbeat

JERUSALEM — One-quarter of Palestinians in the territories oppose reaching a peace agreement with Israel, according to a survey released last week.

Overall, however, the 21-question poll showed Palestinians largely supported the Cairo agreement that granted them self-rule in Gaza and Jericho.

Some 58 per cent said they welcomed the agreement, while 55 per cent said that the return of PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat made them confident and optimistic about the future.

More than 70 per cent of the nearly 2,000 Palestinians in the territories polled said they would support an agreement similar to that reached in Cairo for implementation elsewhere in the territories.

The poll has a three per cent margin of error.

Nearly 60 per cent of those questioned said they agreed with the statement, "The PLO should try to make agreements with Israel, even if such agreements bring only slight improvements."

Some 27 per cent said they agreed with the statement, "The PLO should not make any agreement with Israel."

British Jews Rally Against Conference

LONDON — Thousands of supporters of an extremist Muslim group that has openly called for the killing of Jews are planning to hold an international conference here next month.

The Aug. 7 event, for which some 12,000 tickets have been distributed, has sparked protests from members of Parliament and concern from the Jewish community.

Members of Britain's Muslim community of 1.5 million, the vast majority of whom oppose radical fundamentalism, have also expressed concern.

The meeting, billed as the largest of its type outside the Muslim world, has been organized by an Islamic fundamentalist group calling itself Hizb ut-Tahrir. The group, which has been banned in most pro-Western Arab countries, attacks Western values and stridently opposes Jews and Israel.

There is speculation that some of the costs of the rally will be picked up by Iran.

One of the group's leaflets, advertising a previous meeting in London, said: "The hour of the resurrection wil not come until the Muslims fight the Jews and kill them."

Members of Parliament, the Board of Deputies of British Jews and student leaders have petitioned Home Secretary Michael Howard and Attorney General Sir Nicholas Lyell, asking for a crackdown on the organization's propaganda.

MP David Sumberg, said it was "appalling" that a group threatening the safety of Jews and others could hold a conference in London.

As of last week, British officials had declined to take legal action.

Students Demand Trial for Papon

PARIS — Demanding a speedy trial for possibly the last Frenchman accused of crimes against humanity during World War II, the Union of French Jewish Students demonstrated recently in front of the home of Maurice Papon.

Papon, 83, was secretary general of the prefecture of Bordeaux under the collaborationist Vichy government until the liberation of the city in August 1944.

Although Bordeaux was not occupied by Nazi troops, Papon was allegedly responsible for the deportation of 1,690 Jews from the region to Nazi death camps.

Papon, who served as Paris police chief in the 1960s and was a cabinet member in the 1970s, has so far managed to evade trial with a series of legal manoeuvres.

In another demonstration in front of his house a few months ago, students read aloud the names of the Jews Papon allegedly arrested and deported.

Gay Rights Case Hits IDF

JERUSALEM — In a case that could have a major impact on gay rights here, the homosexual partner of an army colonel who died of cancer is suing the Israel Defence Force (IDF) for a survivor's pension.

In a Tel Aviv court last week, the IDF stated it did not recognize Adir Steiner's claim that he lived as the partner of the late Col. Doron Maisel, adding that Steiner had no rights as a member of Maisel's family.

Citing letters Maisel wrote before his death, Steiner, in turn, claimed the IDF knew that he and Maisel lived together for the last eight year's of Maisel's life.

Steiner further argued that when he accompanied Maisel abroad for cancer treatments, the IDF gave Steiner the same security check as would have been given to a wife accompanying her husband.

No verdict has yet been handed down.

Live Radio From Israel

TORONTO — For the first time, live radio broadcasts from Israel are to be available throughout North America for owners of television satellite dishes, via cable television companies and rebroadcasts for local AM and FM stations.

Three times a day, listeners will hear detailed news broadcasts from Kol Israel in Jerusalem, followed by programs on a wide range of subjects, including Israeli music, Judaism, news analysis and sports.

The broadcasts are sponsored in part by Bezeq, Israel's telephone and telecommunications company.

The half-hour programs are Israel Radio's contribution to the London, England-based World Radio Network (WRN), a new global 24-hour news and information service.

Beginning Aug. 1, WRN transmission will be on the Galaxy 5 satellite at 125 degrees west, via the WTBS transponder (#6) on a frequency of 3820 MHz, audio 6.8 MHz. This covers all of Canada, the United States and the Caribbean.

A trial distribution is currently available via SCOLA TV on ASC1 at 128 degrees west, channel 23, audio 6.2 MHz, and also via digital transmission on Telstar 401 at 97 degrees West.

Swimmer Breaks World Mark

MONTREAL — Gershon Shefa, one of the best swimmers Israel ever produced, broke his own world record at the World Master's Swimming Championships held here recently.

Shefa, 51, clocked a time of 2:50.57 in the 200-metre breastroke.

He also won a gold medal in the 50 to 55 age group in the 100-metre breaststroke, and a silver in the 200-metre freestyle.

Shefa was a member of Israel's swim team at three Olympics: 1964, 1968 and 1972. He chairs the Master's Swimming Association in Israel and manages the pool at Kibbutz Givat Chaim, near Netanya.

Shefa was one of three Israelis competing in the master's championship, held at the Olympic pool here.

Ined Thein, 76, won a gold medal in the 200-metre backstroke with a time of 4:06.53. Ahmed Nator, a 32-year-old Israeli Arab, did not take home a medal.

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer FRED M. CATZMAN has been researching their origins over the past few years. Mr. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

TARSHIS — SAPIR

While we have many Jewish surnames derived from the German word for various precious stones (like Diament, Ruben and Braunstein), we also have some Hebrew names as well.

Sapir is sapphire.

Tarshish is the Hebrew word for chrysolite, a semi-precious stone. It is also a place name described in the Bible.

SOLIDARITY

Thousands of Israelis gathered in Tel Aviv last week to proclaim their solidarity with the Jews of Argentina, still reeling from the July 18 bomb blast at the Jewish community centre. The explosion has claimed an estimated 100 lives. The Spanish message on the sign at left reads, "Together in Pain. Enough!" See page 7 for more on the bomb's aftermath. [Israel Photo]

British security 'bungled,' Israeli official charges

By BERNARD JOSEPHS and LORRAINE KIRK
London Jewish Chronicle

LONDON — Scotland Yard's unprecedented around-the-clock guarding of some 100 Israeli and Jewish institutions here came amid charges that British authorities had failed to heed a number of specific warnings from Israeli, Argentinian and local communal officials that an attack by Muslim fundamentalists was imminent.

Hundreds of armed police stood guard outside Jewish and Israeli facilities in Britain last week in the wake of the car bomb attacks that shattered the Israeli Embassy last Tuesday and the offices of the Joint Israel Appeal (JIA) early Wednesday morning.

The Foreign Office acknowledged publicly on Wednesday that it had received a security alert from Israeli diplomats as early as July 18, the day of the bombing of the Buenos Aires Jewish community building that killed an estimated 100 people.

The Foreign Office passed on the warning "without delay" to the "proper authorities," according to a spokesman.

Officials at JIA headquarters also passed a similar warning to police in a meeting just hours before the building was hit with a car bomb last week. The JIA is the British equivalent of the United Jewish Appeal.

The British police reportedly responded to the Jewish officials' concerns by saying they did not expect additional acts of terror against Israeli or Jewish targets after the attack on the Israeli Embassy earlier that day.

Ya'akov Lehrer, head of the Jewish Agency delegation in London, which is housed in the JIA building, said Jewish Agency leaders left the meeting with British police Tuesday with the feeling there was a "lack of readiness or willingness to respond" on the part of the British officials.

In addition, the Board of Deputies of British Jews said its repeated warnings of a potential attack had met with little response from the security services. The alleged security lapses threatened to develop into a full-scale diplomatic row, as both JIA and embassy staff returned to their wrecked offices.

Israel's military attache, Brig.-Gen. Azriel Nevo, said the attacks resulted from "true blunders" by the security authorities.

Communities step up security

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish communities across Canada have gone on a heightened state of alert, in the wake of terrorist bombings in Buenos Aires and London that claimed an estimated 100 lives and left many more injured.

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) has asked synagogues, community centres, communal institutions and schools to "take prudent precautions" to ensure their safety, said Bernie Farber, CJC's national director of community relations.

Paul Marcus, national director of the B'nai Brith Institute for International Affairs, said the organization's staff have been asked to be more vigilant.

"There is certainly heightened awareness and the staff have been advised to look for suspicious objects and unidentified individuals," he said.

Both Farber and Marcus said they have been in contact with law enforcement officials who have promised to step up patrols in neighborhoods containing Jewish institutions and buildings.

"The bombing of our Jewish communal centre in Argentina was the bloodiest attack on Jews outside of Israel since World War II," said Congress president Irving Abella. "In light of [the attacks in Argentina and London] we must continue to be vigilant of our security needs."

A security committee established several years ago by CJC "constantly assesses the threat level temperature," Farber said. It has sent out a list of recommendations to a variety of Jewish organizations, outlining ways they can enhance their security.

The committee has also been in contact with local police, the RCMP and CSIS, Canada's intelligence service.

"They have no information that the Canadian Jewish community faces any particular threats, but they suggest we be more cautious, alert and vigilant," he said.

The Montreal Jewish community has benefitted from a security coordinating committee for more than four years, said Michael Crelinsten, executive-director of CJC, Quebec region. The committee includes CJC, B'nai Brith, the Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA), various cemeteries, schools and other groups.

It has been in close contact with the Montreal Urban Community Police, which has agreed to increase patrols in Jewish neighborhoods, Crelinsten said.

This year, a "security package" sent to Jewish organizations in advance of the High Holidays will be particularly timely, he said . It sets out security measures that can be taken by participating community organizations.

Congress and CJA have had "security measures in place for some time now and these have been verified and beefed up where appropriate," Crelinsten said. Staff have also been instructed on security measures. "We feel confident they know what to do."

In Ottawa, the community is "taking added security precautions at the community centre and the Jewish community campus" which houses a day school and a camp, said Ruth Kahane, director of community relations for the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa. Synagogues and other institutions are following suit.

"Following [the attack in] Buenos Aires, the security alert was put in place and it has not been lifted," Kahane said. "Now, we continue to remain vigilant."

The community centre has security personnel in place and all entrances but one have been closed, she said. In addition, parking at the community centre is closed.

Police in Ottawa, Nepean and Gloucester have each agreed to step up patrols, she added.

Vancouver's Jewish community is on a "high security alert and each agency is assuming responsibility for dealing with [security]," said Marilyn Berger, associate director of CJC, Pacific region.

Congress has advised Jewish organizations to upgrade their security as necessary, Berger said. It has also been in contact with Vancouver police and the RCMP, who she said have been very cooperative.

IDF tries to save Rwandans

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

GOMA, Zaire — Eleven Rwandan children dehydrated from cholera were the first patients taken to the Israel Defence Force (IDF) mobile hospital dispatched to the sprawling refugee camps here late last month.

The children, lying motionless and silent on the ground, waiting to die, were packed into an IDF pick-up truck flying the Israeli flag. One little girl died on the 10-minute drive to the hospital. Another died upon arrival. Their bodies were covered and placed some 200 metres away from the Israeli MASH.

Then two trucks made a second trip, trying to save the lives — more accurately prolong the lives — of others. But there are, by most estimated, one million other refugees living in disease-wracked camps.

Environment Minister Yossi Sarid led Israel's 77-person team, which included reserve soldiers, drugs, food, water and a fully-equipped mobile army surgical hospital flown here by eight Hercules aircraft.

"Please, you must take more, I no longer can take them. They will die in 20 minutes," pleaded a UNICEF doctor from India with the Israeli team. Dr. Danny Engelhard and two of his regular army medics were clearly shaken by what they saw.

Sarid, carrying a girl who was near death, nearly vomited.

"Death has become a way of life," he said.

Soldiers could not hide their tears, suppressed while driving through the refugee camp.

"It will take me a lifetime to absorb this, but I'll need another few years to get over what I saw today," said one of the soldiers after hauling another child into the truck.

Jay Feinberg

Screening clinic for Feinberg

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In their heart and commitment to the philosophy Kol Yisroel Areivim Zeh Bazeh (All the people of Israel are responsible one for the other), Canadians have much of which to be proud.

Jay Feinberg is a 25-year-old New Jersey man who is desperately seeking a bone marrow transplant to survive chronic myelogenous leukemia. Clinics have been held all over the world to try to find a compatible donor, including in Canada.

The next one will be held Tuesday, August 16 at the B'nai Brith Building, main auditorium, 15 Hove St., from 5 to 9 p.m.

The most recent clinic held in Toronto at the Jewish Community Centre last month, brought out close to 500 people.

"The response in Canada has been absolutely remarkable," Feinberg told The CJN in a recent telephone interview.

"We have had some of our biggest drives there. I know they will help a lot of other people too, and that makes me happy."

If there is no match made for Jay Feinberg, the sample is entered into the Canadian and United States bone marrow registries. Matches have been made for several others with the same disease, including some Canadians.

Doctors say the best chance for a successful transplant is to have someone of the same ethnic origin as the patient, in Jay Feinberg's case, Eastern European Jewish.

Funds are also needed to help with the cost of all the laboratory testing. In Canada, contributions can now be sent through Congregation Machzikei Hadas, 2310 Virginia Dr., Ottawa, Ont. K1H 6S2. Note on the cheque that the money is to be directed to Friends of Jay Feinberg.

The test takes only a few minutes, and consists of a simple and painless blood test.

Toronto has come out for Jay Feinberg, and for others like him, before. We must not fail him this time.

For more information, call Dr. Marshall Deltoff, (416) 783-4914.

'One-stop shopping' for seniors planned

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A new agency is in the works under which seniors, or their families, may be able to get the help they need with one phone call, whether for a homemaker or a rail for the bath tub.

This good news comes from the decision of the Ontario government to restructure services to older adults and the disabled. What form this will take is not yet clear but Jewish seniors being served by such agencies as Baycrest Centre and Senior Care will be affected.

Many older adults, like Marcel and Mary Salzberg, need community services to help them maintain their independence in their own home. But most people don't know what services are available or how to find them.

The Salzbergs, both in their 80s, and married 42 years, were lucky enough to get the help they needed to enable them to live in their own aparment.

Mrs. Salzberg is losing her eyesight as a result of diabetes. "I'm almost blind," she says. "It's hard for me, but I want to stay home." Mr. Salzberg has high blood pressure and arthritis and walks with a cane.

They have no children and no family in Toronto to count on for support. Both were feeling very isolated and alone until they found services through Baycrest and Senior Care.

Five years ago, Mr. Salzberg's physician suggested he try Baycrest Day Services for Older Adults.

"It was hard for me to come and I didn't know what to expect," he said. "But now I can go to programs in English, Yiddish and Hebrew, and I exercise and go to arts and crafts. It's a good place for me at my age."

His social worker, Fran Kleiner, helped him apply to Baycrest's new out-patient arthritis program which he is now attending.

Mrs. Salzberg isn't interested in attending Day Care herself. She was a Baycrest volunteer for more than two years, but says she can't see well enough to continue.

She prefers the assistance she gets through the Volunteer Visiting Program offered by Senior Care, the operating name of Community Services to Jewish Elderly.

For the past few months, Senior Care volunteer Lotte Watson has been visiting Mrs. Salzberg once a week. "She takes me shopping and helps me get what I need. She even takes me to have lunch at her house. She is very good to me."

She tells of the time Watson brought her grandchild over on Mother's Day. "They gave me flowers and a gift, the first gift I ever received on Mother's Day. I cried and cried."

She speaks with equal affection about Senior Care social worker Susan Samila who provides her with counselling and support through the Client Intervention and Assistance program.

"My days are very long. I can't read the paper or watch TV and I can't cook anymore," she says "I now have these two beautiful friends."

A survivor of the Holocaust, Mrs. Salzberg says she is a nervous person and needs people to help look after her.

Alhough the Salzbergs want to remain at home, they have applied to the Jewish Home for the Aged "in case it becomes a necessity." Social workers Samila and Kleiner worked together on the application.

Day Care offers a full day of social, recreational and educational activities to older adults living in the community. It features door-to-door transportation, kosher meals and snacks, case management and counselling, multilingual programs and access to other Baycrest services such as occupational and physiotherapy and out-patient clinics.

Computer and modem give access to the electronic shtetl

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — You don't have to be a computer genius to access the electronic shtetl.

Once you master the system (a matter of a few hours, according to one user), all you need is a computer and a modem, and the world is at your fingertips. Literally.

If you want the Jewish world at your fingertips, it's just as simple. By pressing the right keys on your keyboard, you can discuss Middle East politics, find out where to get a kosher meal in Strasbourg, France, access an Israeli university library or hook into an electronic shadchan and meet a variety of Jewish singles.

As of this summer, you can contact the Israeli embassy's electronic bulletin board called SHALOMail ON ISRAEL [CJN, July 21] to access information about Israel.

Other Canadian projects include CAJIN (Canadian Jewish Information Network) and JEWISH STUDIES JUDAICA eJOURNAL, a provider of information on Jewish studies.

The information superhighway caters to a far-flung community of Jews from Australia to Zambia. It is especially valued by Jews in isolated communites such as blacksburg, a university town in rural southwest Virgina, where Rebecca Scheckler recently sat down at her computer to let The CJN know that "electronic connections with the worldwide Jewish community are important to our isolated town."

Scheckler had sent the message to University of Toronto student Yehuda Poch, 23, after he put word out — electronically — that he had an upcoming interview about Jewish use of the Internet, the world's largest computer network, linking up to 20 million people.

Going online with Torjews

Poch, like Scheckler, is a local "representative" for "Jerusalem1," a nonprofit Internet project launched last year by Zvi Lando, a former American now living in Israel. Representatives such as Poch and Scheckler have volunteered to redirect or answer questions about their community via electronic mail. Other Canadian reps can be found in Ottawa, Montreal, Regina and Saint John, N.B.

"Community and kosher information is where it gets really useful," noted Poch. A quick look into the Saint John file shows, among other things, that the community boasts a kosher tea room in its Jewish Historical Society museum.

Jerusalem1 is the umbrella for a number of sub-networks, among them "Torjews," an on-line discussion group for subjects of interest to the Toronto Jewish community.

Poch created Torjews earlier this year after noticing that other Jewish discussion groups had many Toronto subscribers, he said.

The Jerusalem1 system has at least 50 to 60 such lists, estimates Poch. Torjews currently has over 60 subscribers; the number has doubled since May. Poch considers it an average size for a local list.

Israeline, a daily news update run by Israel's foreign ministry has over 5,000 subscribers and is growing every day, Poch said.

Although Jerusalem1 is based in Israel — which means, improbably, that a message from Toronto to Montreal is routed through the Middle East — the cost to the user is minimal. Hourly rates range start at about three dollars, unless networkers are affiliated with a university or a business, in which case they can use the system for free or at reduced rates.

Internet is appealing in a number of ways, said Poch.

"You can be in touch with anybody in the world in a matter of minutes, and you get to hear interesting new developments you wouldn't hear otherwise."

As a student, Poch finds the Internet useful for research. He noted that users represent a broad spectrum — politically, geographically and in terms of observance.

"There's something in it for everybody," said Poch. They just have to be there, look around and find it."

Community urged to take part in relief efforts for Rwanda

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Members of the Jewish community in Canada are being urged to participate in local relief efforts to aid the hundreds of thousands of Rwandan refugees who have fled to neighboring countries.

In a memo to the regions of Canadian Jewish Congress, the organization's national president Irving Abella recommended that Jews "join whatever relief efforts have been taken locally to bring an end to this human tragedy."

The memo also notes that the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) has established a relief fund to provide food, shelter and medical assistance to Rwandan refugees.

The JDC, at the request of the United Nations High Commission for Refugees, will be setting up a tent city in Tanzania. The JDC will also be sending doctors from Ethiopia to Zaire to help with the treatment of refugees.

Meanwhile, the executive committee of Mazon Canada will be meeting this week to discuss Rwandan relief efforts and other topics, said Marilyn Aarons-Guttman, executive director of Mazon.

Mazon Canada, which bills itself as "the Jewish response to hunger," raises money that it allocates to grassroots organizations that provide meals to the hungry.

Meanwhile, Israel and U.S. Jewish organizations have launched separate, large-scale efforts to bring aid to the 1.2 million Rwandan refugees in Zaire.

Last week, Israel dispatched eight transport planes loaded with medical equipment, a 77-member medical team and supplies to set up a field hospital. It is believed to be the largest aid effort ever sent abroad from Israel for disaster relief.

The Israel Defence Force 120-bed hospital will include operating and intensive care facilities, special children's care units and x-ray and emergency lighting equipment.

One Israeli transport plane was fitted with giant tanks filled with thousands of gallons of fresh water — a key commodity in the cholera-infested camps.

The team will spend two weeks on the Zaire-Rwanda border before being replaced by a fresh group from Israel. The Israeli presence will likely last a total of six weeks.

Meanwhile, a coalition of 35 American Jewish organizations has solidified to provide assistance to the refugees, with the JDC overseeing the project.

A unique partnership to help the refugees has also been formed between the JDC and the African-American Institute, a multiracial, multi-ethnic organization that specializes in creating mutual understanding between the United States and Africa and in developing human resources in Africa.

A Rwandan father cradles his sick child while awaiting medical treatment in a refugee camp. Despite increasing Western aid, thousands continue to die of cholera inside the border with Zaire. [RNS Photo/Reuters]

Approximately 15 black organizations will participate in the effort, under the coordination of the Institute.

The black-Jewish collaboration "reflects a long history of cooperation between the two groups," said Dorothy Davis Joseph, director of public affairs at the Institute.

The coalition was originally assembled to organize relief for Somalia, but it doubled in size for the current effort, said Gideon Taylor, director of special projects at the JDC.

The first concrete steps in the American Jewish effort involved the purchase of two water filtration units. The units can pump 50,000 litres of water a day.

A medical team was also scheduled to arrive in Rwanda last week.

The estimated cost of these combined efforts is $700,000 and the addition of other projects could raise the total to $1 million. About $300,000 raised by the JDC for Somalia relief is being transferred to the Rwanda fund.

For those wishing to participate in the JDC relief effort, donations in the form of cheques should be made out to JDC — Rwanda Open Mailbox and mailed to the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, 711 Third Avenue, New York, NY, 10017, U.S.A.

Child survivors plan Montreal conference

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Judy Herczeg considers herself one of the lucky ones.

Born in Hungary in 1940, all she remembers of the war are hazy bombings, her mother hiding from the Nazis in a closet and time spent in a hospital cared for by nuns.

Herczeg says she is drawn to other Jews who were children during the Holocaust. She's not alone; a few years ago, 1,600 people like her gathered in New York for the first international conference of child survivors.

Many had been orphaned and left to fend for themselves. Others were in ghettos and camps, or on the run with their families. Still others were taken in by non-Jews or by convents, their Jewish identity hidden, often even from themselves.

The next international conference of child Holocaust survivors will take place in Montreal Oct. 7-10 at the Queen Elizabeth Hotel. Let Memory Speak: The Legacy will feature over 60 workshops.

The conference is intended for any Jewish person who experienced Nazi persecution before age 18. Today they range in age from their early 50s to the mid-60s.

Such conferences are therapeutic for the participants, who feel almost a familial connection to others with similar experiences, Herczeg said. Many have only "come out" recently, after years of avoiding talking about their past or hiding their Judaism, she said.

It is also important that such conferences bear witness to the Holocaust by the youngest people who remember it, child survivors say..

"We have joined together to share our experience, to help us understand their effect on our lives, to provide support in our difficulties and to reaffirm our existence," said conference chair Erika Hecht.

Herczeg freely acknowledges that many of the child survivors have been affected psychologically by the trauma they suffered or by confusion over their identities. Some of those adopted by Christians have only recently begun to embrace their Jewishness, while others remain ambivalent. In Poland, hundreds of middle-aged people have returned to Judaism, after discovering their roots.

Some researchers, like Robert Krell of Vancouver, have termed child survivors "the forgotten generation" of survivors. "They were ignored as participants and disregarded as witnesses as if children had no memories at all," Hecht said.

"Our parents — in many cases our adoptive caretakers — were mainly concerned with our integration into 'normal' life. Our memories were not explored, our losses not recognized, our pain never acknowledged. We were only children, we were 'lucky,' we were supposed to forget and adapt."

In Montreal, a group of child survivors and former hidden children meets regularly under the auspices of the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre.

"If you scratch the surface, you will find a lot of anxiety and emotional baggage," Herczeg said. "Up till now most of us were too busy making a living and raising a family [to explore our feelings]. Now we have the time to think about what we went through."

The Montreal conference will include workshops for non-survivor spouses and members of the "second generation," children of survivors born after 1945. Organizers want to encourage dialogue between the two generations to recognize that the past has affected their lives and for the children to accept this legacy.

In addition to providing emotional support to these now aging child survivors, the conference will continue videotaping their testimonies for history and Holocaust education.

Those interested in the Montreal conference should write to: Child Survivors/Hidden Children Conference, 5151 Cote Ste. Catherine Rd., Room LL10, Montreal, Que. H3W 1M6.

CJN receives journalism awards

TORONTO — The Canadian Jewish News has received two Simon Rockower Awards for excellence in Jewish journalism.

Montreal editorial staffers Janice Arnold, David Lazarus and Elias Levy, together with editor Patricia Rucker, were awarded second place for excellence in comprehensive coverage for The Jews of Montreal, an extensive three-part series which ran on the eve of the referendum on the Charlottetown Accord in October 1992.

Toronto reporter Ron Csillag received an honorable mention for excellence in feature writing for his report on the Kaballah Centre in March 1993.

Judy Shapiro, editor of the Jewish Free Press in Calgary, Alta., also received an honorable mention for excellence in spot news reporting for her article, Calgarians celebrate rescue of Danish Jews.

The awards, which were announced at the annual convention of the American Jewish Press Association in Princeton, N.J. in June, are open to all AJPA member publications and individuals. The competition spanned 18 months, from Rosh Hashanah 1992 to the end of 1993. Members of the association include, in addition to all major North American Jewish publications, the Jerusalem Post and the Jewish Telegraphic Agency.

The series on the Jews of Montreal included interviews with community leaders and with Quebec politicans and opinion-makers on both sides of the constitutional debate. In commenting on the series, the judges stated:

"These articles clearly show that the some 90,000 Jews of Montreal are a very vibrant people, whether they are affiliated with the ultra Orthodox, the Orthodox, the Conservative or Reform movements. Montreal's Jewish support for Israel is also clearly defined."

Csillag's article examined in detail the operations of the Kabbalah Centre, a worldwide effort aimed at teaching Kaballah, or Jewish mysticism, to anyone who wishes to learn it. The article described the financial success of the Toronto branch and the enthusiastic support it receives from its students, as well as the often hard criticism it has generated from many rabbis who question the authenticity of its teachings.

Zundel seeks Canadian citizenship

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — German-born neo-Nazi Ernst Zundel has applied for Canadian citizenship, and there may be very little that can be done to prevent him from getting it.

Zundel is one of the world's leading suppliers of Holocaust-denial propaganda and he has two convictions in Germany under the country's anti-hate laws, but that in itself may not be grounds from withholding Canadian citizenship.

"There appears to be no impediment to his citizenship due to the foreign convictions," immigration lawyer Mendel Green told The CJN. "He's eligible for Canadian citizenship."

Lawyer Marshall Drukarsh, an associate of Green's, said, "The foreign convictions in and of themselves do not make him ineligible."

Immigration Canada spokesman Kevin Sack said that federal legislation sets out the criteria upon which citizenship is granted. Those over 18 who have no serious criminal convictions or who don't present a threat to Canada's security are eligible, he said.

"The law does not provide for a person's character to be assessed, aside from criminality," he added.

But Drukarsh believes the Citizenship Act does leave the minister some discretion in determining whether to grant citizenship. Under the legislation, the minister must grant citizenship if an applicant meets certain criteria and demonstrates an adequate knowledge of the responsibilities and privileges of Canadian citizenship.

"My understanding of Zundel's activities are that I would be very concerned that he is manifesting something other than an adequate knowledge of the responsibilities and privileges of Canadian citizenship," Drukarsh said.

"His public persona causes me concerns over whether he is demonstrating an adequate knowledge of Canada," he added.

Jewish groups are upset at the prospect of Zundel becoming a Canadian citizen. Bernie Farber, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, said citizenship should be withheld from him because of the convictions in Germany and because he is under investigation in Canada for promoting hatred. (Congress has asked that charges be laid against Zundel for claiming the Holocaust was a Jewish hoax.)

"I don't think that any Canadian would want Zundel as a citizen. It would give Canadian citizenship a bad name," he said.

Granting Zundel citizenship "would be an affront to minority communities throughout Canada and it would send the message to hatemongers the world over that Canada is a haven for racism," said Brian Morris, national president of B'nai Brith Canada.

Morris pointed out that as a landed immigrant, a status Zundel has held since moving to Canada in 1958, Zundel is liable for deportation if he is convicted of criminal charges and if he receives a substantial jail sentence.

"Zundel realized that his only option to avoid being sent back to Germany was to get a Canadian passport," Morris suggested.

Jewish women connect in Kiev

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Nancy Barat describes Jewish life in the former Soviet Union as a "renaissance," her observation comes from more than her years of teaching art history.

Barat, a Windsor resident, was in Kiev this May to attend an international conference of Jewish women organized by the Chicago-based Project Kesher.

Over 180 women from the former Soviet Union and 120 from the West took part. Barat was one of two Canadian participants; a third, Corey Levine of Fredericton, came to Kiev from Prague.

The week-long conference was a revelation, said Barat, 53. Although the city's Jewish population has shrunk to 20,000 from its prewar high of 200,000, "Judaism is alive and well in Kiev, despite Hitler and despite Stalin," she said.

Barat and daughter Carolyn Weinberg, a psychotherapist now living in New York, spent 15 hours a day discussing topics like continuity, entrepreneurship, Jewish education and women's issues with their counterparts from Moscow, St. Petersberg and Kazahkstan. Barat said one woman flew for three days from Siberia to attend the conference.

Language was not a problem; conference organizers hired 30 young Jewish women, all students at Kiev's Solomon University, as translators. But Barat said the women soon came to a greater understanding.

"One woman [from the former Soviet Union] stood up at the beginning and said, 'We have nothing in common.' But at the end we were hugging each other — we had made a real strong connection.

"We're all Jewish women doing the same kind of things, just in different settings."

Torontonian Cheryl Tallan, 59, also attended the Kiev conference. She too said she returned with a better understanding of what it means to be a Jewish woman in that part of the world.

"I have a great admiration for these women," said the student of Near Eastern Studies at the University of Toronto. "I think we have no sense in Toronto, where it is so easy to be a Jew and any kind you want to be, how difficult it is [there]. We have other problems, but these problems [of identity] we don't have."

Tallan does not attend synagogue, unlike Barat, who belongs to Windsor's Reform Temple Beth-El. She signed up for the Kiev conference to meet "bright, dynamic women" and to visit her mother's hometown of Brusilov, 80 km west of Kiev.

She accomplished both. In her druzhba, or cross-cultural discussion group, Tallan connected with women from Minsk, Vilna and Perm, Siberia. She spent one morning in Brusilov with a British acquaintance and met the last Jewish resident of the once thriving shtetl.

Project Kesher is a 5-year-old organization that supports Jewish renewal projects in the former Soviet Union.

Quebec's Jewish voters face interesting choices

Janice Arnold has covered four Quebec elections for The CJN, beginning in 1976, when the Parti Quebecois and its leader Rene Levesque set Canada on its ears. As she and colleagues David Lazarus and Elias Levy begin coverage of yet another campaign, with the polls showing the PQ under Jacques Parizeau in the lead, Arnold has prepared this look at the attitudes of Jewish voters in Quebec.

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The election of a hard-line separatist government may be just around the corner, but little dismay is discernible among Jewish voters in the early days of the Quebec election.

More people are talking about whether Robert Libman, the former pro-English rights Equality Party leader, can win D'Arcy McGee as an independent against Liberal challenger Lawrence Bergman, than what's going to happen if or when the Parti Quebecois takes power. D'Arcy McGee is the "Jewish" riding, at least 75 per cent so.

Another topic of conversation is whether the PQ will make any converts in the Jewish community — specifically among francophone Sephardim — with the running of Salomon Cohen, a Moroccan-born Israeli immigrant, in Outremont; and its efforts, so far unsuccessful, to recruit other Jewish candidates, Sephardi and Ashkenazi.

The community also is a bit confused about where its leadership is going. There was Max Bernard, community relations chair of Canadian Jewish Congress Quebec region, telling PQ leader Jacques Parizeau unequivocally in April that the Jewish community is determinedly federalist; while Thomas Hecht, the chair of Canada-Israel Committee Quebec, was quoted in a front-page article in the daily Le Devoir, in February, as saying sovereignty is a "legitimate option" and accepting an honorary position with the Fete Nationale (St-Jean Baptiste) committee.

This time around, there is no candidate with close ties to the officially nonpartisan organized Jewish community — as Liberal Gary Waxman, and earlier Herbert Marx, did. (They both ran in D'Arcy McGee.) CJC community relations director Jack Jedwab dropped out of the Liberal nomination race when it appeared Bergman had taken the lead.

Bergman, a 54-year-old notary, is a political newcomer and relatively unknown except to his Hampstead modern Orthodox synagogue, Adath Israel-Poale Zedek, where he is president.

Libman, 34, who came out of nowhere five years ago to found Equality in the wake of anglophone bitterness over Bill 178, the language law passed under the notwithstanding clause of the Constitution, in spite of a Supreme Court ruling that it violated freedom of speech.

Libman lost some friends when he left the moribund Equality last year, partly because of his support for the Charlottetown constitutional accord; and some credibility after his foiled bid to seek the Liberal nomination.

He remains personally popular in the riding, so much so that a rumor went around that if he lost he'd be urged to run for mayor of Cote St. Luc in November.

But with the Quebec electorate being given a black-and-white choice between federalism and sovereignty, and the favorable opinion most Jews have of Daniel Johnson, Libman will have a difficult time getting re-elected.

Libman has the advantage of being well-informed, articulate and politically experienced. Libman's organizers believe that their ace card is goading Bergman to debate with him.

Bergman's strength is hammering home that every vote for the Liberals is a vote against separation. Libman counters that this is scare tactics. His theme is that D'Arcy McGee will not decide the election and that federalists do have a choice. Ironically, according to this strategy, Libman's chances are enhanced if a PQ landslide is predicted.

The D'Arcy McGee campaign is shaping up as a scrappy duel between two otherwise unfailingly polite and restrained men.

Libman has accused Bergman of being "powerless" to represent his community's concerns within the Liberal party because it ignored his protest against picking former labor leader Yvon Charbonneau, a vociferous anti-Zionist in the past, as a star candidate. Bergman, who calls Libman "passe," turned around and reported Libman to the chief electoral officer for allegedly breaking the Election Act by posting campaign signs too early.

Meanwhile in Outremont, the riding which, due to changes in the electoral boundaries has the second-highest Jewish population, Salomon Cohen is earning a reputation as a tireless campaigner. His determination has already paid off in his unexpected win of the PQ nomination in May over party favorite, lawyer Armand Elbaz, who is also from Morocco.

Elbaz, president of a Jewish day school and an executive member of the Sephardic communal organization, the Communaute Sepharade du Quebec, was an "instant Pequiste" recruited by the party in a deliberate effort to find Jewish and other ethnic candidates.

Two other Jewish prospects — whose names were announced prematurely by PQ leader Parizeau at the CJC regional plenary in April — got cold feet.

Anglophone Warren Saks, 34, who was at first excited about standing for the PQ in Notre Dame de Grace (where there was no chance of winning), suddenly withdrew in May because his family did not share his enthusiasm. The other prospect, Armand Essiminy, a lay leader of the Rabbinat Sepharade du Quebec, equivocated for months over whether to be the PQ sacrificial lamb in D'Arcy McGee, and finally decided against it.

Cohen, 48, lived for 10 years in Israel before emigrating to Montreal in 1971. An administrator by profession, he has lived in Outremont for many years and boasts he has been a sovereignist for 23 years. He was active in the 'Yes' campaign of the 1980 referendum on sovereignty-association.

For some 15 years, he was associated with a group promoting friendship between Israel and Quebec francophones. He has likened Zionism and the creation of Israel to French Quebecers' nationalism. He comes from a prominent Moroccan family, and his brothers have held leadership positions in the Montreal Sephardic community.

Outremont has never elected a PQ member, even though many intellectual and artistic nationalists live there.

The number of Jews in Outremont has grown somewhat with its expansion into the Snowdon district. Outremont is home to most of the chassidic and other ultra-Orthodox communities, who in recent years have wielded their political influence, helping to elect (and defeat) municipal and federal politicians.

Cohen is not likely, however, to pull them away from their support for incumbent Liberal Gerald Tremblay, a cabinet minister who has shown care for the Chassidim's concerns.

Francophone Sephardi Jews, more than 20 per cent of the community, have generally not been as nervous about the PQ and Quebec nationalism as their anglophone co-religionists, and have for years shown an openness to forming friendly relations with the party. But that geniality has not, and will not necessarily, translate into votes. Most Sephardim recognize that political and economic stability is in their best interest and federalism is seen as the best guarantee of that.

Moreover, Parizeau's blustering about Quebec's future being decided by francophones only has not helped the PQ win the confidence of any minority.

Cohen, incidentally, is not the first Jewish PQ candidate. There were at least three in the past — all Ashkenazi — although none in the last provincial election.

Not to be forgotten is the fourth Jew running, Russell Copeman, the Liberal in Notre Dame de Grace. Copeman, 34, was one of the few anglophones on the party staff and most recently was constituency aide to former Premier Robert Bourassa. He has a good chance of reclaiming the riding for the Liberals; it's now held by independent Gordon Atkinson, formerly of Equality.

CJC-Q can be expected, for the most part, to sit out this election despite its crucial nature. The reason is not disinterest, but rather that it is caught between its staunch federalist stand in the constitutional debate and its traditional nonpartisanship. It is more preoccupied with preparing to deal with a new government, quite different from the one that left office nine years ago, and the possibility of a subsequent referendum battle.

The Libman vs. Bergman duel may seem like a pleasant interlude by then.

Hectic tour of Israel for seven BQ members

OTTAWA — Seven members of the Bloc Quebecois spent a week in Israel recently on a tour sponsored by the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC).

Christiane Gagnon (Quebec), Pauline Picard (Drummondville), Jean-Guy Chretien (Frontenac), Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier-Montcalm), Francine Lalonde (Mercier), Yvon Loubier (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot) and Gilles Duceppe (Laurier-Ste. Marie), as well as Quebec Liberal MP Nic Discepola, accepted the CIC's invitation to visit Israel and gain a better understanding of the country's political situation. Only Gagnon had been to Israel before.

CIC staff member Philippe Elharrar said the trip was for francophone MPs; other Liberal MPs were invited, but declined, he said.

The group, accompanied by Elharrar from the CIC Quebec office and Shimon Fogel of the national office, were hosted at the Knesset for lunch with members of the Labor, Likud and other smaller parties across the political spectrum.

They also met with academics and journalists, including Druze and Palestinians.

They travelled up to Metullah on the Lebanese border and also spent some time at a kibbutz.

Elharrar said the tour was hectic, but the Quebecers seemed to have a good time.

The CIC sponsors one or two trips to Israel a year for parliamentarians, Elharrar said.

Exclusive Brian Morris

Toronto lawyer Brian Morris, 48, recently succeeded Gabriel Nachman as president of B'nai Brith Canada. Since joining the organization's Institute for International Affairs in the late 1980s, Morris has held a number of national positions within the organization, including national chair of the institute. He has represented and led delegations on behalf of B'nai Brith Canada to meet with King Hussein of Jordan, ambassadors from Hungary and Romania and senior embassy officials from the United States.

A native Montrealer, Morris has a history of involvement with the Jewish community dating back to his student days at McGill University, where he was a member of the Student Zionist Organization. More recently, he has been a director of Associated Hebrew Day Schools for a number of years.

CJN: How would you describe the role B'nai Brith Canada plays in the Canadian Jewish community?

Morris: I think it is a major player in the Jewish community. It is an extremely proactive organization, committed to fighting racism in all forms and to advancing Jewish and Israeli causes. To that end we have become highly involved in the political arena.

We meet with parliamentarians very frequently, and we push Jewish issues. We have an election task force that was very active in the recent federal election, and we'll be very active in both the Quebec provincial election and the Ontario provincial election this year.

CJN: How would you describe the relationship between B'nai Brith Canada and Canadian Jewish Congress?

Morris: Congress has a job to do, and we respect them for the job they do.

I'm loathe to answer what the relationship of Congress is to B'nai Brith, but I think they see us as usurpers trying to transgress on their territory — at least that's the feeling that they give to me.

CJN: Is B'nai Brith addressing that issue, or do you plan to address it?

Morris: It's very hard to address. I don't believe anyone exclusively represents the Jewish community. I don't know what the negative reaction is against B'nai Brith. Our goals are essentially the same as theirs. What is the difference who accomplished what?

I don't understand the friction, quite frankly, and I'll do nothing to contribute to it, but I don't think the friction is of B'nai Brith's making. I don't think it's within B'nai Brith's hands to eliminate the friction. I think it's a one-way street — the friction, that is.

CJN: [B'nai Brith Canada's executive director] Frank Dimant has spoken publicly about the issue so vehemently that some people might think that B'nai Brith is contributing to the friction.

Morris: You know, if you're called "delegitimate" and "an interloper" so many times, sometimes you see red rather than keeping your cool, but I don't think Frank would differ very much from my position.

We are prepared to work with Congress. We are prepared to work with the federations. I think we do work fairly well with the Zionists. Our agenda is a Jewish agenda, and I think it's a very legitimate agenda.

I think the problem comes when you say you have a Jewish agenda which involves political activity; [then] you are deemed by Congress to be a trespasser.

I would be extremely pleased if I were able to get [shalom bayit] with Congress and the federations. It is something I try to do.

CJN: What is the relationship between B'nai Brith Canada and the lodges?

Morris: I think to a large extent we have made a lot of progress on creating shalom bayit in B'nai Brith. The friction between District (B'nai Brith Canada) and the lodges has been reduced.

CJN: Why was there friction between District and the lodges?

Morris: I wasn't around when the problem started. I inherited it. I think a lot of the problem has been dissipated simply by goodwill and openness on both sides.

I think there was a lack of communication. For instance, everyone worries about expenditures. I think the lodges did not feel they had access to the financial picture of District. That's been completely [resolved]. We simply took lodge members, and they drafted the budget. The accounting recommendations made by the lodges were accepted by District. At the convention that just passed there was absolutely no friction.

I'm not saying it's over, but I think as it becomes clear to the lodges that District is open to them and that their concerns will be addressed, I think you will see a further reduction of any friction that is out there.

CJN: What are your priorities now as president of B'nai Brith Canada?

Morris: My immediate priority is funding for Jewish day schools in Ontario. I have spent about three and a half years on that so far, and one of the main reasons I took the presidency was to push that issue as far as possible.

In Ontario we have always been a strong advocate with regard to acquiring tuition for Jewish day schools. To that [end] we have been working two parallel roads — working very hard with all three [political] parties; and negotiating with other groups with a view to getting funding either through the front door or the back door.

I don't want to promise anything, but there's been a lot of movement which hopefully will lead to success. I'm sorry, I can't elaborate any further at this time.

CJN: B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights has a youth league. What else is the organization doing to keep young people involved in the Jewish community?

Morris: We have a complete speaker roster, and we do send people out to youth groups and universities. We give them information they need on any area that they wish, be it fighting anti-Semitism, be it Why Remain Jewish? We engage in a lot of educational fora. We have downtown lectures on the average once a month. We are extremely active on the educational aspect.

CJN: What's the financial situation of B'nai Brith Canada right now?

Morris: It's tough, like all Jewish organizations, but our debt load is going down, not up. Our biggest debt is the mortgage on the building.

CJN: What is B'nai Brith's annual budget?

Morris: I really don't want to get into it.

CJN: Is B'nai Brith still running casinos as a form of fund-raising?

Morris: B'nai Brith runs bingos and casinos. Those are a major source of our revenues, but we've decreased the activities in the casinos because they [haven't generated] sufficient revenues. Bingo is still extremely successful, and we do an awful lot of that.

CJN: Did lodge members feel the casinos were a good idea?

Morris: I think membership in general [has been] supportive of any activity that generates revenue. The membership is sophisticated enough to realize that we require funds. We don't have UJA behind us, and we are not funded by the federations. We support ourselves, and we need our sources of revenue.

CJN: Tell me about the work that B'nai Brith is doing with the Palestinian community here.

Morris: We have always reached out to Arabs in general, so it was really no surprise that when things changed in the Middle East they approached us [to arrange a meeting on the day of the signing of the Declaration of Principles between Israel and the PLO], and at the first approach we said yes.

We are meeting with them on a fairly regular basis — at B'nai Brith, at Palestine House, and in private homes. I myself have not been to Palestine House, but other members have been.

The issues that are discussed [include] how joint economic effort can raise the standard of living for both communities in the Middle East.

CJN: What function do you see B'nai Brith's newspaper, The Jewish Tribune, fulfilling?

Morris: I think it's like any other newspaper. The more it does, the greater its readership will become.

I'd like to see the Tribune change and upgrade itself. People really don't know the work that B'nai Brith does. We don't really tout our accomplishments.

Instead of just a page of B'nai Brith activities, I'd like to feature each lodge. The lodges do a tremendous amount of work. I think lodge activities are going to be [the paper's] main feature.

I'd like to upgrade the paper to the extent that we have movie reviews and book reviews. We have very good people in our Institute for International Affairs. We have a lot of professors on our board. I'd like them to write some critical articles about what's going on in the Middle East, Europe and elsewhere.

I would really like to expand the horizons of the paper. If you see a lot of changes in the paper in the immediate future, I would not be too surprised.

CJN: What makes you think that people don't know about B'nai Brith's work?

Morris: I think the reality in our community is that B'nai Brith may do a lot of work, but the perception of the public is that it was Congress who did it. I tell people about our accomplishments, and the response is, "I thought Congress had done those things."

I don't think one in 20 people in the Jewish community knows that the Get legislation exists, or that it was a B'nai Brith accomplishment. [Following a B'nai Brith study, Canada's Divorce Act was amended four years ago to prevent divorcing Jewish spouses from using the Get as a bargaining chip in civil proceedings].

CJN: How is it that B'nai Brith has become so involved in the international community?

Morris: Let me give you an example. A couple of years ago I went as part of the Canada-Israel Committee to visit Yves Fortier, then Canadian ambassador to the United Nations (UN), to complain about Canada's changing voting pattern at the UN. He told us that Canadian foreign policy was to a large extent influenced by meetings of non-governmental organizations which occurred annually in February in Ottawa.

I went to the first one of those meetings [concerning the Middle East] about four years ago, and it was an extremely frightening experience. The enemies of Israel, for lack of a better description, were extremely well prepared. They had presented position papers, and the anti-Zionist diatribe that I heard that day would have, I think, frozen the blood of any Canadian Jew. I don't think anyone would have believed that such rhetoric could be heard in a Canadian public forum sponsored by the government of Canada.

The first time I spoke, I was booed and hissed. We got very involved, put our top lay people on it, started to present extremely informative briefs, worked hard at forming allies, and met with a lot of the NGOs. Just by meeting with them we were able to correct a lot of misconceptions and to challenge a lot of misinformation they had.

Two years ago I had the extreme pleasure of opening up the government brief, and seeing that on the Middle East they had incorporated practically holus-bolus the brief prepared by B'nai Brith the previous year. We also saw a tremendous change in that the meetings became more neutral.

We went on from there to get a very substantial grant from the federal government to research anti-Semitism world-wide.

CJN: Have you ever encountered cultural barriers on any of the international missions in which you've participated?

Morris: No, because the first thing we do is meet with the local Jewish community. They act as our guides, and we don't go in unless we're briefed.

CJN: As president, how do you keep current on all the different aspects of B'nai Brith, which range from international issues to B'nai Brith baseball teams?

Morris: I'll tell you how: our staff. Without them, B'nai Brith would not function. We really don't have "employees." The hours they spend are incredible. They are all totally committed.

I could not attend a meeting [with politicians] without staff support. You cannot believe the briefing reports I get. There's a lot of competent research. We're an extremely professional organization.

CJN: What drew you to B'nai Brith in the first place?

Morris: I came in because of the work that B'nai Brith was doing helping Soviet immigrants. They were in the forefront, and doing an awful lot of work very quietly and very efficiently.

I was impressed by what they were doing — negotiating agreements with Hungary and Poland to establish exit points. They were successful at what they did, and to their credit they kept quiet about the whole thing.

So for a lot of people who think that Frank likes to vocalize [about] everything B'nai Brith does, I think they would be very surprised at how much B'nai Brith has accomplished and how little we brag about it.

Buenos Aires Jews 'in panic'

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The Jewish community in Buenos Aires is "extremely anxious" about security arrangements following the second terror attack there in two years, Israel's Maj.-Gen. Ze'ev Livne said last week upon returning from the Argentine capital.

Livne led the 43-man rescue team that traveled to Buenos Aires to help fire and rescue services reach the victims of the July 18 bomb blast.

"The community is highly critical of the Argentine government over slack security precautions," he said.

Said one member of the team: "Although we searched for documents, that wasn't a critical issue for the community. The main issue was to find bodies."

The team worked for 160 hours non-stop and uncovered 60 bodies. The death toll from the blast has reached at least 100.

Examinations revealed that all victims died at the time of the blast or a few minutes later, said Livne.

"Even if the Argentine rescue teams had worked more quickly, the chances of finding people alive were slim," he noted.

The local rescue services, although highly motivated and dedicated, did not have the ability or knowledge to work as quickly as the IDF team, he added. If the Argentinians had worked alone, the operation would have taken a few more weeks, he said.

"This tragedy to the Jewish people was caused by three factors: a booby-trapped car containing hundreds of kilos of explosives, together with an old building which literally crumbled with the explosion.

Timing was also a determining factor: The explosion occurred at exactly 9:50 a.m. when many people were in the building," said Livne.

The Argentine Jewish community is gripped with panic over terrorism, according to a Jewish Agency official.

Uri Gordon, head of the agency's Immigration and Absorption Department, said Jews in Argentina are reluctant to enter Jewish institutions or send their children to the Jewish schools they regularly attend.

Gordon has been in regular telephone contact with Jewish community leaders in Buenos Aires.

The insecurity is characterized by distrust of their government's ability to protect them or capture those behind the bomb blast, he said.

"There seems to be a feeling in the community that only Israel is capable of finding the perpetrators and bringing them to justice," said Gordon, who was in Buenos Aires in 1992 when the Israeli Embassy there was bombed.

Hezbollah is innocent Syrian minister claims

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk al-Sharaa has denied that the Islamic fundamentalist Hezbollah movement was responsible for the bombing of the Jewish community centre in Buenos Aires or last week's car bombings in London.

Sharaa made the statement during a news conference here last Wednesday after meeting with French Foreign Minister Alain Juppe.

Israeli officials, including Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, have blamed Hezbollah for the recent spate of attacks and have accused Syria of not using its influence to halt such attacks.

Saying the bombings could not be linked to any fundamentalist groups based in Lebanon, Sharaa charged that Israelis, not Syrians, were supporters of terror.

"We are not at all happy about what is going on in violence or sabotage and destruction, unlike some Israelis who rejoiced at the massacre in Hebron," he said, referring to the Feb. 25 killings of 29 Palestinians by Jewish settler Baruch Goldstein.

"Syria is not for violence, but Israel practices violence in one way or another in the occupied territories and in Lebanon," he added.

The Syrian minister refused to say whether any progress had been made in the Israeli-Syrian peace negotiations following last month's visit to the region by U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher.

But Juppe said he believed the negotiations "were making progress, although I don't want to be excessively optimistic. In any case, they're still going ahead between the Syrian and the Israel sides thanks to American mediation."

Bombings condemned

OTTAWA — Foreign Minister Andre Ouellet last week condemned the bombing of the Israeli Embassy in London and attacks against Jewish targets in the United Kingdom, Argentina and Panama.

"These acts only serve to underscore the importance of concluding a just peace in the Middle East and testify to the wisdom, courage and leadership of those who have fought so hard for peace, especially Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat and King Hussein of Jordan," Ouellet said in a statement.

The minister also welcomed the signing last month of the Washington Declaration, which ended the state of war between Israel and Jordan.

"All Canadians pay tribute to the leadership and courage of King Hussein and Prime Minister Rabin," Ouellet said.

Canadian Jewish Congress, the Canada-Israel Committee and B'nai Brith Canada all issued statements praising the signing of the Israel-Jordan pact.

BBC reminded Hussein that four of its leaders met with the king in Calgary in 1989 to discuss the prospects of Mideast peace.

British charged with bungling over terror threats

And Jewish communal officials, as well as several members of Parliament, accused the government of being "soft" on the threat posed by Muslim fundamentalists.

In a pointed allegation last week, World Jewish Congress president Edgar Bronfman said Argentinian President Carlos Menem had warned British officials that he — Menem — received a tip from an Iranian dissident that an attack in London was imminent.

"Menem even phoned London to warn them," Bronfman was quoted as telling the Reuter news agency.

However, officials in both London and Buenos Aires denied Argentina provided advance warning of the London blasts.

Britain's charge d'affaires in Israel, John White, was summoned to the Foreign Ministry in Jerusalem last week, where officials demanded greater vigilance by the British authorities.

Yehuda Milo, the ministry's deputy director-general for Europe, voiced to White Israel's "deep concern" over the two London bomb attacks.

White was asked to "urgently relay" Israel's concern to the British government and was told Israel hopes British authorities and security forces "make every effort to safeguard and protect the buildings housing Israeli and Jewish institutions in London and Britain."

As armed police continue to stand guard on more than 100 potential Israeli and Jewish targets, both sides have made efforts to calm the atmosphere.

Israeli Ambassador Moshe Raviv — who described the attacks as "despicable" — met Foreign Secretary Douglas Hurd, who pledged that Britain would do all in its power to catch the terrorists.

The Foreign Secretary also promised to provide help in repairing the damage at the embassy.

"Mr. Hurd was very forthcoming and we were pleased with the way the meeting went," said an Israeli official.

Board of Deputies President Eldred Tabachnik, United Synagogue President Seymour Saideman and the board's defence committee chair, Ronnie Stekel, met Wednesday with the minister of state, David Maclean, who pledged that the Home Office would do all in its power to protect the Jewish community, both in London and the provinces.

Maclean is the No. 2 official in the Home Office, which oversees all domestic security affairs.

The massive policing operation, announced by Scotland Yard Commissioner Sir Paul Condon, would not be lifted without consultation, Maclean told the delegation.

However, Tabachnik expressed disappointment that the government remained unwilling to ban members of extremist groups such as Hamas and Hezbollah from entering Britain.

"I told him that we believed we needed to send a powerful signal that they are not welcome here. We feel that one reason London has been chosen as a target is that the government has not taken tough enough a line on such groups," said Tabachnik.

Britain's Foreign Office said a caller claiming to belong to the Islamic fundamentalist Hamas movement took responsibility for the bomb outside the Israeli Embassy, but Hamas officials in the Middle East have reportedly denied involvement.

The bomb outside the JIA building went off at 12:46 a.m. Wednesday, injuring five people, none seriously.

The attack came less than 24 hours after a bomb exploded outside the Israeli Embassy in central London, destroying the consular offices attached to the embassy and injuring at least 13 people.

Police believe the two attacks were linked because of their timing, method and explosive power. The bombs, both placed in cars outside the targeted buildings, were approximately the same size — 13 kilograms (30 pounds).

The JIA building, which is in a northern suburb of London that is predominantly Jewish, is about 10 km from the Israeli Embassy.

Communities step up security measures

Berger said the protective measures that are being taken are similar to those adopted during the 1991 Gulf War. They include greater security at the Jewish centres and more police patrols.

Meanwhile, Israeli institutions in Canada are being "more cautious than usual," said Eli Yerushalmi, councillor at the Israeli embassy in Ottawa.

"All Israeli embassies and institutions all over the world are on higher alert following a directive from Israel," he said.

In addition to employing their own security measures, "we are in contact with local authorities regarding security," Yerushalmi said.

"It is sad to see that when peace is progressing people who are against peace are acting against us," he said. Israel is requesting "worldwide cooperation against this kind of radical terrorism," he added.

B'nai Brith, meanwhile, called on the Canadian government to establish a joint forces operation to combat hate and terrorism. The proposed unit would include all law enforcement agencies in Canada including local police, the RCMP, CSIS, immigration officials and Crown attorneys.

Marcus said B'nai Brith has also written to Solicitor General Herb Gray, who has authority over the RCMP, and to Immigration Minister Sergio Marchi urging increased border control and greater vigilance against terrorist infiltration.

Dan Brien, communications assistant to the Solicitor General, said, "We're very mindful of international events and security is a paramount concern. But for security reasons we can't say what advice CSIS is giving the RCMP or other security forces."

Gaetan Blais, a spokesman for CSIS, would say only that the intelligence organization is mandated to investigate threats to the security of Canada, including acts of violence to further political goals.

RCMP inspector Jean St.-Cyr said the force has "increased our vigilance, but I cannot give any details in regards to what kind of security we are doing."

In other developments, a group connected to Hezbollah last week threatened to attack Israeli interests in the United States, and the Israeli consulate and UN Mission building in New York reportedly received a bomb threat.

Five-ton steel-reinforced concrete barricades were put into place around the Israeli consulate and UN Mission building at Second Avenue and 42nd Street. New York Police Department spokesmen and consulate officials did not confirm the threat, but a uniformed officer guarding the entrance on Second Avenue said there had been a bomb threat against the two Israeli institutions.

Sometime after 1 a.m. last Wednesday, several Manhattan police units arrived at the scene and cordoned off the sidewalk. Later that morning, sanitation cranes unloaded the 20 five-ton Jersey barricades, and police investigators began patrolling the area.

Extra police protection was also assigned to several other Jewish institutions in the city as part of the heightened security measures.

Police cordoned off the Fifth Avenue Synagogue during a memorial service for the victims of the Buenos Aires bombing.

Consulate spokesman Gidi Mark-Amir said business was continuing as usual at both the consulate and the UN Mission. He said the consulate itself had not received any bomb threats.

An Israeli spokesman in Washington said the embassy was tightening its security in light of the recent bombings, but the spokesman refused to say how. Israeli consulates around the United States also took steps against possible attack.

In developments elsewhere, Belgium tightened security around its Jewish community.

Police had been asked to step up patrols and tighten surveillance of buildings belonging to the 45,000-strong Jewish community, the Belgian news agency Belga quoted an Interior Ministry official as saying.

Police in Antwerp, whose big diamond trade involves many in the Jewish community, had stepped up patrols in the Jewish area, it said.

Belgium's Jewish community experienced several attacks in the early 1980s. A 15-year-old Jewish child was killed in 1980 when a Palestinian threw a grenade at a group of school children in Antwerp.

Security was also tightened around France's Jewish community, the fourth largest in the world, officials said.

"We have done our normal duty under the circumstances," a senior official of CRIF, the umbrella organization for France's estimated 750,000 Jews, told Reuters.

"We are in contact with government authorities who had already taken special precautions when this began, and we hope they will reinforce them together with us," the official stated.

She declined to detail the measures which had been taken to protect dozens of buildings and schools around the country.

A spokeswoman for the Israeli Embassy in Paris, always tightly guarded in a closed-off side-street near the Elysee presidential palace, declined to give details of extra measures taken there.

Paris was the scene of numerous attacks linked to the Middle East in the 1970s and 1980s, including bloody bombings of synagogues and Jewish restaurants, attacks on embassies and airlines, and the killing of Palestinian and Iranian exiles and Israeli diplomats.

Declaration's Main Points

WASHINGTON — In their joint declaration issued July 25, Jordan and Israel agreed

- To aim for "a just, lasting and comprehensive" peace between Israel and its neighbors and to conclude a Jordan-Israel peace treaty;
- That Israel respects Jordan's "special role" at Muslim shrines in Jerusalem and will give it high priority in negotiations on the city's permanent status;
- To terminate the "state of belligerency" between them;
- To refrain from threats of force against each other and to thwart terrorism;
- To open direct telephone links between the two countries, and to link their electricity grids;
- To open two new border crossings, one at Akaba-Eilat and the other at a point to be agreed on in the north;
- To give free access in principle to third-country tourists traveling between Jordan and Israel;
- To speed negotiations on an international air corridor between the two countries;
- That their police forces will cooperate in combating crime, especially drug smuggling;
- To continue negotiations on future bilateral economic cooperation, including abolition of all boycotts;
- And that King Hussein and Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin will meet periodically to review progress in negotiations.

Israel Plans Six Highways

JERUSALEM — Israel's public works department announced last week it is planning six major highways into Jordan.

Department spokesman Meir Gazit said the most obvious route — and that which had already been proposed in talks among Israel, Jordan and the U.S. — was between Akaba and Eilat.

The planned road is to cost $1 million (U.S.). Both Israel and Jordan will have to lay about a kilometre-and-a-half of new highway, he said.

Further north, a highway is to go from the Nitzana border crossing with Egypt to Petra.

Hamas Offers Swap

JERUSALEM — Hamas last week offered to return the body of missing soldier Ilan Sa'adon in exchange for the release of several prisoners.

In a leaflet and video tape released last Tuesday, the group asked for the release of their spiritual leader, Sheikh Ahmed Yassin.

They also demanded the release of Sheikh Abdel-Karim Obeid and Sheikh Mustafa Dirani, who were abducted by the IDF from southern Lebanon.

Sa'adon was abducted from the Negev in 1989 and presumed murdered by Hamas terrorists.

One Killed, 17 Injured

JERUSALEM — An Israel Defence Force (IDF) paratrooper was killed and 17 other soldiers were wounded in well-planned Hezbollah attacks on a convoy and IDF posts in the security zone in Lebanon last Monday.

The injured included the deputy commander of the Givati battalion, who suffered serious wounds, two with moderate wounds, and 14 lightly wounded.

IDF and South Lebanon Army (SLA) artillery returned fire, and Israel Air Force planes bombarded seven Hezbollah positions north of the security zone.

Intifada Deaths Down

TEL AVIV — The number of intifada-related casualties and incidents has drastically declined since the implementation of Palestinian autonomy in Gaza and Jericho, says Shin Bet, Israel's internal security service.

According to Shin Bet figures, eight Israelis were killed in Israel and the territories between May through July. That's compared to 28 Israeli deaths in incidents related to the Palestinian uprising during the previous three months.

And 29 Israelis were wounded in intifada-related incidents in the last three months, compared to 121 in the previous three-month period.

The number of Palestinians killed in the intifada also dropped since the self-rule began, from 34 between February and April to 10 between May and the present.

The number of violent incidents also dropped considerably, said the Shin Bet director, who is never identified.

Within the past three months, there were 60 violent incidents in Gaza, compared to 480 in the three months preceding that.

Violent incidents inside the Green Line, the pre-1967 borders, also dropped, from 22 between February and April to six between May and the present.

Intifada-related incidents were also down in Jerusalem, from 98 between February and April to 33 from May to the present.

Waldheim Knighthood Concerns BB

WASHINGTON — B'nai Brith has expressed disappointment over Pope John Paul's recent conferral of a papal knighthood on former Austrian president Kurt Waldheim.

The honor was bestowed on Waldheim in a July 6 ceremony at the Vatican's embassy by the Holy See's ambassador to Austria.

Waldheim, the former Secretary-General of the United Nations, has been ostracized by most of the Western world for having hidden his role as a Nazi intelligence officer in the Balkans during World War II.

"For Kurt Waldheim to be honored in this manner does dishonor to previous recipients," said B'nai Brith International president Kent Schiner in a statement.

School Kids Aid Clean-up

GENEVA — A group of schoolchildren last week volunteered to help clean up a Zurich cemetery that was the target of vandalism in June.

Two 11-year-old boys confessed to the June 17 desecration of more than 100 gravestones at Switzerland's oldest Jewish cemetery. It was the second or perhaps third recent vandalism of the site.

The children, ages 11 to 18, explained that their volunteer effort was a way of showing their solidarity with the Jews and of registering their disapproval of racist acts.

Repairs to the cemetery, which was opened in 1862, were expected to cost some $30,000.

A police spokesman said that the latest desecration should not be brushed off as "nasty kids' games."

E.J.C. Leader Appointed

PARIS — The French government has appointed Jean Kahn, the leader of the European Jewish Congress, as the French representative to the newly created European Consultative Commission on Racism and Xenophobia.

The appointment of Kahn, who is also head of CRIF, the umbrella of France's Jewish organizations, was announced recently by French Minister for European Affairs Alain Lamassoure.

The member states of the European Union ratified the creation of the new anti-racism commission, at the suggestion of France and Germany, during the latest E.U. summit, held June 24-25 on Corfu.

Each member of the E.U. — including the four newest members, Austria, Finland, Norway and Sweden — will have one representative on the new commission, which is charged with assessing national and community policies in the struggle against racism and xenophobia.

Mideast Naval Gazing

HALIFAX — Commanders of Middle East navies, including Israel's, will meet here in a symposium, tentatively scheduled from Aug. 29 to Sept. 1, as part of Canada's ongoing contribution to maritime confidence-building measures in the Mideast.

The symposium follows last month's demonstration for officers of Middle East navies of both Search and Rescue (SAR) and Prevention of Incidents at Sea (INCSEA) concepts involving the Canadian warship, HMCS Halifax. The demonstration took place near Venice.

Canada has been asked by Mideast parties to share its naval and coast guard expertise with Mideast navies, starting with a workshop in Sydney, N.S. last year attended by both Arab and Israeli participants.

Canada has also been asked to prepare a draft text for a multilateral INCSEA Agreement in the Middle East.

Rabbinical Reflections

By RABBI MARK FRIEDMAN

I am certain that if I asked my readers "Do you consider yourself to be a sensitive person?" I would receive a unanimous "yes."

All of us, man or woman, child or adult, see ourselves as sensitive people. If someone makes a joke at our expense, we feel hurt. If somebody pokes fun at our appearance, we feel the sting. If a superior or co-worker criticizes us in the presence of others, we are stunned and angry.

I would also suppose that all of us are sensitive to body language and other non-verbal communication. If another responds to something we have said with a wave of the hand, we understand the response which our comments have generated.

But let us take another look at our supposed sensitivity. The situations mentioned above refer only to the vulnerability of our own feelings. What about the feelings and sensibilities of others? Is there not an outer-directed aspect of sensitivity which is as important as the inner-directed side?

Of course, the answer is yes. We live in a world with a great variety of people and we must be responsive to their feelings in all kinds of situations. Yet, how would each of us rate ourselves in this area? Are we "sensitive people" when it comes to the sensitivities of others?

At this point, one might say: "Rabbi, why speak of sensitivity towards others? Either you have it or you do not have it. It is not like learning a skill." Granted, it is not a skill which can be acquired by mastering certain lessons. However, there are guidelines which help us be aware of others' feelings. It is true that sensitivity to others comes easier to some people. Still, it is a trait which requires our diligence and effort if it is to be cultivated.

Where do we look in order to discover guidelines? One of the wonderful things about our tradition is that it touches every aspect of life. The issue of sensitivity is no exception. In the Torah's discussion in the Book of Shmot, Exodus, of the plague of darkness upon the land of Egypt, we are told the darkness was so thick that, in the Torah's words, "lo rau ish et achiv," — people could not see one another.

Some commentators interpret this phrase figuratively, that is, the darkness which enveloped Egyptians was the darkness of immunity to the needs and concerns of people around them. According to these commentators, this plague of uncaring was so complete as to prevent people from seeing, being open to each other. This is a major stumbling block to the development of sensitivity. In many cases, we are really not open to others' feelings and needs.

This may be most apparent in times of crisis, for example, when a friend or relative requires hospitalization. Rev. Randy Jones, chaplain of Overlook Hospital in Summit, N.J., has written: "We give in to our own need to cheer somebody up . . . patients have told me so frequently [of] being told 'cheer up,' . . . or some other kind of advice like 'count your blessings.' All this talk is meeting our own needs to have the patient make us feel more comfortable."

Rev. Jones also writes of those who visit and are flip. They try to humor the patient. They tell an interesting story or joke in order to get a smile from the patient. However, what is really being said is, "Let's not deal with heavy stuff today. I'm either too busy or I'm emotionally out of gas. Let's keep it light today." And usually the patient will comply with the visitor's request.

There is the problem. The purpose of the visit is not to really visit the sick, but to ease what is an uncomfortable situation for the visitor. In these kinds of visits there is no openness, no readiness to allow the patient the opportunity to share his or her emotions and concerns with the visitor. The patient may even be able to discern right after the visitor enters the room what kind of a visit will take place. When the visitor stays away from the patient and does not sit down, the message transmitted to the ill person is "I really cannot help you now. I do not want to be here. I want to keep this as short as possible."

I recall hearing of a get-well card different from the standard kind. It had a picture of a little bird, too fat, too short, with little tail feathers sticking out. Inside the card was written "I can't sing because you're sick." If we visit one who is ill with this sense of not being well because the patient isn't well, if we try to keep in mind the helplessness, isolation and fear the person is experiencing, and if we consider that we too are subject to the same feelings and concerns, then we can truly be empathetic and caring, open and vulnerable to the person. We will sit down. We will take the patient seriously. We will not be in a rush to depart. We will be able to really listen. We will be able to laugh and joke in a helpful, appropriate way. We will truly visit the sick. We will lighten the burden which is upon them.

Sensitivity is a very precious attribute. We have to begin to ask ourselves "am I really sensitive to the needs and feelings of others? Am I really open to them? Do I try to understand their perceptions and their positions?" If we can work so we may answer "yes" to these questions, we will not only affect others greatly but be changed into better, more compassionate human beings.

There is a wonderful poem by William Blake called The Searcher in which the poet distills the great importance of sensitivity. "I looked for my soul. But my soul I could not see. I looked for my G-d. But my G-d eluded me. I looked for a friend and there I found all three."

(Rabbi Mark Friedman is rabbi at the Shaare Zedek Congegation in Montreal.)

Court recognizes civil marriages

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — In a breakthrough decision, Israel's High Court of Justice has ruled that Israel must recognize civil marriages, including intermarriages, of Israelis and other nationals performed in foreign consulates.

The ruling came in response to a petition filed by the Israel Religious Action Centre of the Israel Movement for Progressive Judaism, Israel's equivalent of the Reform movement.

The movement has called the decision the latest step "toward the breaking up of the Orthodox monopoly in Israel."

The Religious Action Centre petition was filed on behalf of a Brazilian couple married in November 1990 in Brazil's embassy.

The wife, Eva Goldstein, was a Christian who married Uri Goldstein, a recent Jewish immigrant who had retained his Brazilian citizenship.

They chose to be married at the Brazilian embassy because Jewish law in Israel dictates that only Jews may be married under Halacha.

Since the British Mandate, foreign consulates have had the authority to marry couples who are citizens of the country represented by the consulate.

But in the Goldstein case, the Ministry of the Interior refused to recognize or register the marriage as legal. The ministry had argued that foreign consulates could not officiate at marriages where one of the spouses is Israeli.

But the court ruled that the ministry had overstepped its authority by failing to register the marriage.

Regev said the decision would help countless new immigrants from Russia, many non-Jews, who want to marry in Israel but are ineligible under the rules of the Orthodox rabbinate.

Mideast peace puzzle still missing some pieces

By YESHAYAHU ANUG

Even by the density standards to which the Jewish agenda — with Israel as its focal point — has now become accustomed, the last two weeks have been unsually dramatic with their agglomeration of tragedy and hope.

While the horrendous images of destruction in Buenos Aires competed on the world's television screens with the even more devastating pictures from Rwanda, peace in the Middle East was slowly inching forward on the shores of the Dead Sea and in Washington, with Damascus watching in the wings.

The sudden prominence of the Israel-Jordan relationship took many observers by surprise. Their attention had been focused on the turbulent Israeli-Palestinian sector and on the enigmatic role that Syrian leader Hafez al-Assad was continuing to play in the complex process of regional peacemaking.

If the Israeli-Jordanian front has become so active during the last two weeks, it is because after the Oslo agreement, King Hussein, very uncomfortably positioned between Syria, Iraq and the now emerging Palestinian entity, had to react to the developments that threatened to leave him in a solitary limbo. He decided to abandon, at first cautiously, his "wait-and-see" tactics and to make the best of the opportunity to settle his own differences with Israel, encouraged by the prospect of a generous U.S. aid package of which he is in urgent need.

But important as this positive development may be, one will have to wait until it fully matures to see how it fits into the regional picture. For even after the spectacular weeks in which past taboos were ignored by the king and warm handshakes were staged and conspicuously televised for the benefit of Clinton's, Rabin's and his own constituencies, missing pieces of the mideastern peace puzzle will have to fall in to place.

The bilateral relations between Jordan and Israel are in relatively good shape and were in no urgent need of particular care at this moment. But they cannot exist in an unsettled vacuum. Thus the real agenda of the meetings in Jordan and Washington, as well as those that are to follow, goes beyond the limited scope of the Israeli-Jordanian relationship and must attend issues concerning other factors.

Yeshayahu Anug

It is therefore not so important to speculate now how Jordan and Israel will settle their known differences over issues such as the sharing of water resources, the handling of the massive refugee problem in Jordan, or the demarcation of the permanent frontier between them — or when a formal peace treaty will be signed. These are all serious issues, but it is much more important for both leaderships to reach understandings, tacit as these may have to be, on the triangular relationship with the emerging Palestinian entity sandwiched between them.

It stands to reason that some of these delicate matters were dealt with well before the ceremonial occasion on the White House lawn, and that the U.S. has undertaken a number of commitments vis a vis Israel and Jordan without which the high-profile encounter would not have taken place.

A brief look at some of the factors which will affect the Jordanian-Israeli rapprochement one way or the other is essential to put the spectacular triumph of Israeli-U.S. diplomacy into perspective.

During his recent shuttle between Damascus and Jerusalem, U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher failed to extract from Assad the answers that could re-ignite the stalled peace talks between Syria and Israel. But there was no indication that the Syrian president intends to actively oppose King Hussein's bold new step. Days before the Washington meeting, Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak flew to Damascus and came back with similar impressions. And a nameless senior American diplomat made his point when he said the best clue to Assad's true reaction to the developments will be provided by the way he handles Hezbollah in Lebanon.

Shortly, Christopher will resume his efforts in Damascus, an indication that the Syrian-Israel peace process is not dead and not even seriously endangered by the new Israel-Jordan accord.

A footnote of some significance in the ongoing effort to read the inscrutable Syrian president: For the first time Syrian TV was allowed to broadcast Rabin's speech at the White House ceremony.

While it is plausible that Assad will now want to interpose a few weeks of suspense before he decides how to advance his own peace talks with Israel, Yasser Arafat's reaction to the king's initiative is even more difficult to assess. He is up to his neck trying to consolidate his autonomy in Gaza and in Jericho, which he wants to expand, and for that he needs a working relationship with Israel and financial help from abroad. Froeign money is waiting to reach him as soon as he proves that he can spend it judiciously and effectively.

He will probably have to lower his ambitions and also to soften his rhetoric regarding his interpretation of the Oslo agreement with Israel, which in his view gave him more exclusivity in handling the autonomy than it does in effect.

Jordan's clout in the West Bank has been considerably enhanced by the new Israel-Jordan relationship and will rekindle the competition between the PLO and Jordan for the hearts of its inhabitants. It is characteristic of the new atmosphere there that many Palestinian notables have already reacted positively to the new development and expressed the hope that it will advance the peace process with Syria and Lebanon as well.

Even Arafat's exaggerated hopes that the Palestinians will be allowed by the Arab world to be the sole custodians of the Muslim holy places will have to be readjusted to the never-absent and now reconfirmed Jordanian role in the administration of these sites in East Jerusalem.

Still, it must not be forgotten that it was the Oslo agreement between the PLO and Israel that revived the peace process after the Madrid start of two years ago, which was practically going nowhere.

Even after the moving ceremony in Washington last September, the Palestinian issue remains the centrepiece of the peace effort and Arafat is still the principal partner. But should he not succeed in playing his part, the new Jordanian-Israeli relationship could well expand beyond its present limited scope.

We are now witnessing a new power structure in the area whose potential must be tested. It offers Israeli diplomacy new options for successful initiatives and holds much hope. But its very presence is also bound to redouble the efforts of hostile forces, known and unknown, both local and foreign, to sabotage peacemaking by all possible means. And this could well become the most decisive challenge.

Assessing Assad's strategy no easy task

BY ALON PINKAS
Jerusalem Post Feature Service

Maj.-Gen. Uri Saguy, chief of intelligence in the Israel Defence Force, has made a career of lecturing on Syria's strategic transformation and about President Hafez al-Assad's intentions regarding peace.

"His [Assad's] view of the changing world, and Syria's lack of superpower patronage once the Soviet Union disintegrated, has led him to reassess Syria's strategic options," Saguy said recently in a meeting with military analysts.

Assad had "to admit failure in attaining military parity with Israel and to begin a process of peace intended to improve relations with the U.S.," he said.

Saguy has reiterated this position - shared by Chief of General Staff Ehud Barak and military intelligence's Syria and Lebanon department - on several occasions.

"This is a process which in effect began as early as 1988," says Prof. Moshe Maoz, head of the Truman Institute and author of Assad: The Sphinx of Damascus (1988) and the forthcoming (1995) Syria-Israel: From War to Peace Making.

"Since his rise to power in the early 1970s, and especially since the 1973 war, Assad has accepted a political solution and UN Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338, albeit on his terms.

"Following the 1979 Camp David accords, feeling isolated and threatened by Israel, he developed the concept of strategic parity, which constituted both an offensive and a defensive posture.

"But in 1987, following a meeting with then Soviet leader [Mikhail] Gorbachev, Assad realized that he would no longer enjoy superpower support. And after the end of the Iran-Iraq war in 1988, in which he supported Iran, he fully understood that power relations in the world had changed, and that he must turn his interests back to the Arab world. That meant Egypt, and that was the beginning of the change."

Another view of Assad's goals considers the symmetrical composition, rather than the essence, of the peace agreement. Intelligence experts, academics, analysts and politicians by and large agree that the Syrian-Israeli peace equation is quite simple.

In return for a full Israeli withdrawal (as distinct from Prime Minister Yitahak Rabin's formula for withdrawal) from the Golan Heights, Syria would be ready for full peace, including normalization of relations.

Graduality, of withdrawal and normalization, is a principle that would be discussed in a later stage of the negotiations, as would the security arrangements that Israel would demand.

The two views diverge at this point, with conflicting interpretations and assessments of the essence of the peace, its attributes, its cost-effectiveness and overall necessity and value.

The debate is over how positively or adversely Israel's strategic disposition would be affected by a peace agreement with Syria.

According to intelligence assessments, Syria is likely to accept graduality. Israel's dilemma stems from an analysis of Syria's strategic predicament, and leads to the question of whether Israel should accept the equation at all, and whether the cost outweighs the potential benefits.

"If Israel wants peace with Syria, it must understand its price," says Yossi Olmert, a Syria and Lebanon expert.

"If the question is, must we reach a peace agreement with Syria, the answer is 'No.' If the question is, should we achieve peace, and is it desirable, the answer is 'Yes,' " Olmert says.

Rabin's formula, according to which "the depth of withdrawal would equal the depth of peace," highlighted the dilemma because theoretically it gave Syria the opportunity to define what "full peace" means, thus overcoming the obstacle contained in Article 5A of the Israeli-Syrian declaration of principles, drafted in Washington last year. But Assad did not seize the opportunity.

Foreign Minister Shimon Peres offered one explanation, saying that Assad is interested in the process, rather than in its results. This view is shared by some in the intelligence community who estimate that Assad is first and foremost a patient man, interested primarily in the survivability of his minority Alawite regime.

In the context of the peace talks, he is interested in improving relations with the U.S. and getting Syria off the list of "terror-sponsoring states," a move that would generate investments in Syria's struggling economy.

Others, such as Eyal Zisser of the Dayan Centre at Tel Aviv University, evaluate Assad as a weak leader, reactive rather than active, influenced and affected by events rather than the other way around.

This view contrasts somewhat with that of Maoz: "He did, in his January 1994 summit with President Bill Clinton, say specifically that he is interested in formal peace."

There are other, subtler indications that Syria has changed, but the change is strategic and not ideological, which is why it is not dramatic, he adds.

Olmert's view is that "this is a man, one of the last dinosaurs, who has an inherent deficiency in understanding the West and the U.S. in particular. I make a distinction between a change in Syria's will and a change in its perceptions and recognition of its own capabilities and limitations. The latter obviously changed.

"Basically, Assad is caught in a contradiction. He opposes graduality and is reluctant to offer normalization. But normalization, as part of the elements he finds difficult to digest, could be accepted only if he agrees to graduality. Otherwise, he will not get the Golan Heights," he adds.

One thing both civilian and military analysts agree on is that Assad perceives Israel as a threat.

"Israel's nuclear capabilities, whether they exist or not, are perceived as a serious threat by Syria," Maoz says.

That is why all the analysts agree that Assad's continued military buildup and modernization are primarily for purposes of deterrence, not an offensive option.

"Following its logic and interests, Syria is right in perceiving Israel as a military threat. Israel, however, is right politically in its negotiating strategy, because we know that in a democracy you cannot [make a] surprise attack out of the blue," said a very senior army officer.

A new beginning for Mideast peace

The Washington Declaration, signed by King Hussein and Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin on July 25, is an historic document which officially ends the state of war between Jordan and Israel. It is one more step along the rocky road to real peace. As King Hussein has suggested, a formal Israeli-Jordanian peace treaty is now in the offing. Coming on the heels of Foreign Minister Shimon Peres' unprecedented visit to Jordan, the Washington Declaration is a watershed. At long last, King Hussein has openly and unambiguously thrown in his lot with the forces of peace in the Middle East.

That King Hussein sought a practical accommodation with Israel is unquestioned. Like his grandfather, Abdullah, who was assassinated in 1951 for attempting to achieve an identical goal, King Hussein never really identified with the reactionary view that Israel has no right to exist, or that it is merely a passing phenomenon.

Nevertheless, he found it politically impossible to race ahead of the Arab consensus with regard to Israel. Jordan was, and still remains, a vulnerable country surrounded by powerful neighbors. Despite these circumstances, King Hussein maintained a mutually beneficial and vital dialogue with Israel which lowered tensions along their common border. For three decades, he met with all but one of Israel's prime ministers, albeit under great secrecy. During this period, Israel and Jordan concluded 38 agreements, the majority unsigned, on matters small and large. In addition, King Hussein rarely found it necessary to close the bridges linking the West Bank with Jordan. And, despite his 1988 declaration severing Jordan's administrative ties with the West Bank, he nurtured close relations with the Palestinians there.

Still, King Hussein hesitated to end Jordan's state of belligerency with Israel. It was not a policy he liked, but one he followed in the interest of Arab unity. Yet, as he now realizes, it brought him nothing but grief — once during the 1967 Six Day War, when Jordan lost the fertile West Bank, and again, when he tacitly supported Saddam Hussein during the 1990-91 Kuwait crisis and thereby isolated himself and gravely damaged his pivotal relationship with the United States.

Sanity vs. fanaticism

In spite of these disasters, King Hussein committed yet a third error of judgment late last year when, under Syrian pressure, he aligned Jordan's policy with Syria's in the current peace process. It seemed as if King Hussein had once more mortgaged his country's future to an Arab power and, furthermore, had wrecked his chances of coming to terms with the most accessible Israeli government since the Six Day War.

But last week, on the White House lawn, common sense prevailed as King Hussein affixed his signature to the Washington Declaration. Like the late Anwar al-Sadat — the first Arab leader to make peace with Israel — King Hussein finally understood that Jordan's national interests, perhaps its very survival, were contingent on reaching an honorable accord with Israel. And the fact that Israel and the PLO had already done so in 1993 convinced him that he had no reason to tarry any longer. Finally, he realized that a rapprochement with Israel would greatly improve, if not enhance, Jordan's strategic links with the West, particularly the United States.

One hopes that the Washington Declaration will give Syria — the last holdout — cause for pause. There have been a number of positive developments in Israel's protracted negotiations with Syria in the last three years. Yet the nitty gritty details of a prospective agreement have eluded both sides. Now that Jordan has committed itself to signing a peace treaty with Israel, Syria may not be too far behind. And if Syria jumps on the bandwagon, Lebanon, its protectorate, is likely to enter into serious negotiations with Israel as well. Certainly, the Lebanese have no intractable quarrels with the Israelis.

After four decades of violence and bloodshed, Israel and its Arab neighbors may be on the cusp of a new beginning. Warren Christopher, the American secretary of state, was not indulging in hyperbole when he observed that the Arab-Israeli dispute is winding down.

But radical Islamic militants, whom Israel has accused of planting terrorist bombs in Buenos Aires and in London, are desperately trying to derail the peace of the brave that Israel, Jordan and the Palestinians in the territories are trying to achieve. These fanatics, however, can be beaten. The Washington Declaration is proof that sanity can overcome fanaticism.

Letters to the Editor

Letters are welcome if they are brief, in English or French, typewritten with lines double spaced, and of interest to our reading public. We reserve the right to edit and condense letters, which must bear the sender's address, phone number and both handwritten and typed signatures.

IF ONLY IT WERE SO

I enjoyed reading Rabbi Plaut's column "Germany remembers the murdered Gypsies" (CJN July 7). It was enlightening and explained to many where and how the racist expression "to gyp" came from. However, I must disagree with the rabbi's conclusion that ". . . the expression 'to jew' was formerly popular but now abandoned."

Alevay volt ess geven azoy. (If only it were so.)

I am enclosing a copy of a letter to the editor of the Milton Independent (Vermont) on the same subject, called To Jew or not to Jew, that was written by my son, Allan Kunigis, who now resides in Vermont and on several occasions overheard this racist and anti-Semitic expression, as did I, here in Canada.

TO JEW OR NOT TO JEW

I am not a verb. I am a human being. I cringe when I hear the expression, "I Jewed him down." At 36 years of age, you'd think I would be used to it, but in my 33 years of living in Canada, I, a Jew, never once encountered this interesting misuse of a noun as a verb. Yet I've already heard it used twice by Milton residents since moving here three years ago.

Are people in Milton prejudiced against Jews? I don't know you all well enough yet to say. I presume there are some anti-Semites within any group of people anywhere. Perhaps this is ignorance speaking. Some people might have grown up hearing this and unthinkingly repeat it. If so, please remember that words can cut like swords, too. And they teach our youngsters.

In the last week, I've heard children in my neighborhood using the word nigger to goad my son's friend, who is black, into a fight. Are they racist? I don't really think so. They probably heard their parents use the word many times, so why shouldn't they?

As a Jew who doesn't look Jewish and whose last name isn't Goldberg or Cohen, I have a special privilege of witnessing ignorance and prejudice in a way an African American or native American might not. I hear people say things they might not say if they knew their audience. I normally keep my mouth shut and walk away.

"Don't go looking for a fight," I tell myself. "They'll never change, so why bother."

Maybe that attitude is wrong. Maybe people really don't know any better. Maybe they just need to be given a chance to learn. So, here's your chance. If you've never met a Jew — hello. Here I am. I am not a verb. I am not an ethnic stereotype. I am a human being. Just like you. With feelings.

WHOSE MESSIAH?

There have been many glitches in the Israel-Palestinian Peace Accord, as one could expect from a complicated political endeavor. However no news has troubled me as much as hearing that Neturei Karta leader Rabbi Moshe Hirsch, will serve in the Palestinian National Authority Cabinet.

Rabbi Hirsch, whose ultra-Orthodox group denounces the existence of the State of Israel, allegedly announced that he will be the new minister for Jewish affairs in the new Palestinian self-rule government. From what I understand, Neturei Karta believes that only the Messiah can mobilize the Jews and bring them to Israel. Therefore it doesn't recognize Israel's existence as we know it, a land that was toiled for and developed by Zionists.

What I am wondering is how can a person who opposes Israel represent its people and comment on Jewish matters? I would expect this to be quite detrimental to the best interests of most Jewish settlers in Israel.

Perhaps Rabbi Hirsch recognizes Yasser Arafat as some sort of Messiah. The question is — whose?

ABOLISH SEPARATE FUNDING

Re: "Equality in Education" (CJN Editorial, July 21).

In order to achieve real equality in education, all separate school government funding should be abolished as opposed to expanded. We live in a secular society. Within our society, we are free to practise our religion. The government's responsibility is to the population as a whole. Institutions which cater to specific religious groups should be funded by the members of that group.

The Task Force on Jewish Continuity was correct in concluding that Jewish education is at the core of Jewish continuity. However, Jewish education is a process of learning that takes place in the home, the synagogue, and the school, in decreasing order of importance. All too often, we become obsessed with the latter and forget the first two.

It is a fool's paradise to think that the extension of separate school funding is the answer to the crisis of continuity facing our community. If we truly wish to bond our children to their Judaism, we do so by living a Jewish life.

ON A WHITE HORSE

Yasser Arafat recently declared his intention to visit Jerusalem, which provoked an understandable widespread indignation among the Israelis.

He may be authorized to do so with Yitzhak Rabin's approval. Rabin stated that Arafat has the same right as any other Muslim to pray in Jerusalem. This brings to mind Arafat's promise to his good friend Saddam Hussein, made in 1900 at the beginning of the Gulf War, that they will ride together into Jerusalem on a white horse.

In order to do so, Arafat, the notorious man of his word, would have to invite Saddam Hussein, also a Muslim, to come along.

Being the person you were meant to be

By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

We Jews generally don't have much love or admiration for some of our own who try to pass as gentiles and don't acknowledge who they really are. But there was one period in history when passing meant life — physical life anyway. That was during the days of the Nazis, when any number of Jewish families temporarily (or so they thought) took their children to gentile families willing to pass them off as their own, and thereby hoped to guarantee their survival.

I don't know how extensive are the available statistics on such children. We have a fair idea of the number of parents able to find their children again and reunite with them, but who will ever tell us of those who were hidden and never discovered?

A memorable film about the subject was broadcast June 7 on TVOntario. It had a simple enough title, and perhaps some potential viewers never turned it on because it held no promise of excitement.

But exciting it was. Hidden Children, part of the TVO series From The Heart, was a one-hour show consisting of a series of interviews with men and women who are now in their late 50s or 60s. Back in the early 1940s they were youngsters — one of them was only 2 when she was farmed out to a Polish-Christian family.

The stories they told were as diverse as one would expect from such a collection of persons who now live in different parts of the world. At the same time they all had something in common: a profound regret and an ongoing — and often tragic — struggle with their identity.

Most of those interviewed grew up as Christians. They had not been told who their real parents were and only later found out — like someone discovering that he/she is adopted — that the parents they knew were not their biological ones. Out of this discovery grew an inner struggle, part of which they shared with the television audience. It was a memorable hour.

I only knew one of them, Toronto author and teacher Andre Stein; the others were strangers to me, but I came to know much of their inner feelings as the minutes went by.

Rabbi Plaut

One of the women summed it up for all of them. She was well groomed, and spoke good English. She said something to this effect: "I have lived all these years with the knowledge that I am not really today the person I was meant to be. It is the kind of knowledge that you never get used to."

One child grew up Roman Catholic and later became a priest. He still serves a parish in Poland. His parishioners call him "the Jewish priest," and while his capacity to perform his duties is not being called into question by others, he himself does so at all times. For many years he has lived as a believing Catholic, and now he knows this is not what he was born to. He feels a bond with his long-dead parents and has decided to acknowledge it in a remarkable manner. "If possible," he says, "I want to be buried in a Jewish cemetery."

The film begins with the tale of a woman who has been angry all these decades — angry at the Nazis who brought it all about, but angry also at the Jews who came to Poland to search for hidden children and never found her, leaving her to an ambiguous existence. At last she made contact with an uncle who lived in Israel, but the Polish communist government did not allow her to emigrate or even visit him. An angry woman — wife of a Pole, mother of five children and grandmother of many — she made it at last to Israel, but the uncle was dead. After meeting her cousins, she said: "I am finally at peace, after all these years." She wanted to belong to a family that had its roots in a common ancestry, and now at last she had found it. She is still bitter, but the bitterness has been lessened to some degree.

My wife observed that the common strand in all these interviews was the issue of survival: the interviewees survived physically, but in all too many instances Hitler had his victory by robbing them spiritually.

Andre Stein tells us quietly and calmly about his own struggle, about the early decision he made to acknowledge his true identity. But I will let him tell you his own story, for I hope you will persuade TVOntario to show this segment of From the Heart once again. Perhaps some of our communal organizations and synagogues will make the tape available to the public. Hidden Children deserves more than one viewing.

Israeli army integrates new immigrants

By CARL ALPERT

One of David Ben Gurion's most frequently repeated comments was that he confidently looked forward to the day when a Yemenite would become chief of staff of the Israel Defence Forces, thus indicating that group's full integration and full acceptance into Israel's society.

Today there are some who look forward to the time when the chief of staff will be an Ethiopian. Even the optimists, however, acknowledge that several generations must yet elapse before that comes to pass.

There are more than a thousand Ethiopians in Israel's armed forces, 22 of them officers. Of these, three are women.

Military service is a source of enormous pride to the Ethiopian youth, reflecting their awareness that they are thereby leaping generations forward. Unlike most Israeli soldiers, who quickly get into civilian dress when on home leave, the Ethiopians proudly remain in uniform. They want to be seen, especially in their own community.

The number of officers is relatively small. A discussion in a recent issue of the IDF weekly magazine, Bamahane, notes some of the difficulties facing them.

For one thing, they are bewildered by the psychometric exams. Coming from an entirely different culture, they don't know what is expected of them in these unusual tests which are applied in the very first stages of officer candidacy.

Further, as an outgrowth of their culture, they display a spirit of compliance, of submissiveness, marked also by lack of initiative. These are hardly the qualities which characterize a good military officer.

The authorities accept that these traits are an outgrowth of the society in which the Ethiopians were reared, rather than an indication of any mental or human deficiency, and are therefore prepared to ease somewhat the criteria for acceptance into officers' training courses. Once in the course, however, the candidates must measure up to the standards set for all.

It is recognized, too, that those who aspire to be officers are already displaying commendable enterprise and ambition, worthy of encouragement.

The army fills yet another function. Because of the great differences in culture and background, the absorption of the Ethiopian immigrants has not been easy for Israel. There has been some criticism that they have been shunted to out-of-the-way settlements, rather than absorbed into the big cities.

Could this be due to discrimination, or fear of color prejudice? Is it an attempt to keep them out of sight as much as possible? Such criticism is based on ignorance of the problems involved.

Social workers and psychologists have explained that the group of Ethiopians was too large to be housed in a typical Israeli middle class neighborhood. They would be made painfully aware of the immense differences, and would immediately want to have the same conditions and facilities as their neighbors, for which they were unprepared.

The army, on the other hand, is the great leveller. All live under the same conditions and undergo the same experiences. Here the Ethiopian young people see and feel that they are like everybody else — hence the importance of military service.

Letters to farblonget meeskeits really hock a cheynik

By ALLAN GOULD

Letters. You remember them. No, not A-B-C or Aleph-Bet-Gimel. I'm referring to those letters that we used to write, in the good/bad old days. We'd actually sit down, scrawl out our feelings and concerns, and then write to mom/dad/sibling-who-was-loved-more-than-us/friend/etc.

And today? Ha! Today, we type on our computers, hit our modem button, and zap it electronically into someone's computer. Or, for the old-fashioned bubbies and zaydes among us, we choose to hit the PRINT-PAGE-EXECUTE buttons on our computer, actually get it printed out on hard copy, and then fax it to someone else. (You old fashioned soul, you!)

But I'm still young enough to recall when people used to send letters, via . . . uh, er, uh — mail — that's it. It was called "mail."

Well, here are a few letters which probably used to be written, if not sent. Maybe one of them will fit your Jewish needs; feel free to copy, with my warm permission:

LETTER TO YOUR LONG LOST BUT SUDDENLY BELOVED RELATIVE

Dearest Auntie ------- and Uncle -------,

How wonderful to finally manage to track you down! I'd lost your address, so I couldn't tell you till now how much I miss you both and think of you and love you! We Jews really do need to be in more frequent touch, since there are so few of us in the world!

I especially wanted to tell you about the birth of our beautiful new baby. You may not have even known that I was married, right? Or even realized that I was grown up? It's been so long since we've seen each other!

But I remember all the countless stories my parents used to tell me about my "super-duper aunt and uncle!" They used to regale the whole family with how kind and warm and sweet you people were — and how generous, too! I've never forgotten those lovely stories.

But enough about me! Are you two well, and in good spirits? I know it must have been terribly hard, with all the media coverage, and all those people trying to tell you what to do with the $33.8 million you won in Lotto 6/49. We wouldn't dream of giving you any suggestions, of course, but we still send our deep love, and our sincerest hope that we can all spend some time together real soon!

Much much love

P.S. — Our daughter will be entering McGill this fall; we're so proud of her!

LETTER TO MOM

Dearest Mother,

I got your letter, informing me about your tough luck and asking if you could borrow a couple of hundred bucks.

Yeah, Mom, I realize how you carried me for nine months, and nursed me, and fed me, and calmed my fears, and protected me, and helped me with my Hebrew School homework, and assisted me in choosing my career in business, and even paid my way through the University of Western Ontario, and furnished my office so tastefully.

And I appreciate it all, dearest Mom, really I do. But you also helped me to become a Quality Businessman, Mom, and everything, as you know, has a bottom line.

So, what have you done for me lately?

Your grateful but businesslike son

LETTER TO A ROTTEN CHILD

Dear ----------,

For some years now, you have been continually expressing the fear that "you and Eema might get divorced." We have both been touched by your concern, and well aware of it.

Well, your Eema and I have slowly come to the realization that we never had any intention whatsoever of getting divorced, and that all the conflicts in our marriage have been due to you, you nasty little thing.

For that reason, Eema and I are now seriously considering divorcing YOU. Our (Jewish) lawyer will be calling you in the morning.

Thanks for the idea,

LETTER TO YOUR DOCTOR, THANKING HIM FOR THAT GREAT NEW DRUG

Dear Dr. -------,

Thanks so much for that great new drug you gave me! It's really great, you know what I mean? And I truly appreciate the fact that you send all these knock-out new mind-benders my way, and don't waste them on my husband, or on other people who just wouldn't appreciate how really great they are.

I've had it with aspirin! I haven't had so much fun since I went to Disneyland as a kid, and I just can't believe that this is all legal, for heaven's sake.

You really are Doctor Feelgood, and on behalf of all the little people dancing around in my head, I want to thank you so very, very, VERY much! And bless you, as well, for making the prescription open-ended, so I can always go and get as much as I need. And I do need a lot, lemme tell you!!!!!!

What a great guy you are! I want the whole world to know! I mean, I'M SO PERFECTLY, GLORIOUSLY HAPPY!!

Yours for stronger & stronger drugs

LETTER TO THE UNITED JEWISH APPEAL

Dear Canvasser/Solicitor/Extortionist for the UJA:

Don't get me wrong. I think that the State of Israel is a wonderful country, and has as much right to exist, in peace and security, as any other nation.

But I AM NOT JEWISH!!! My mother and father were not Jewish. My grandmother and grandfather on my mother's side were not Jewish. My grandparents on my father's side were not Jewish, either. Even my great-grandparents were not Jewish, which should be good enough for anyone.

Yet every other day, a letter, a phone call, a telegram; men appearing at my door, women apearing at my window. Are you people running a charity, or a Mafia enforcement bureau??

Look, I enjoy Mel Brooks and Woody Allen movies as much as the next guy, and Sid Caesar used to be the best thing on television. Norman Lear's situation comedies have brought me much pleasure, and I have been known to hum tunes by Rogers and Hammerstein and Stephen Sondheim; I can't deny it. Why, I even have a few family Bibles around the house, which do, indeed, contain Jewish personalities in both the Old and New Testaments.

But, once again, I AM NOT JEWISH!! I'M NOT JEWISH, AND THAT'S THAT!! So stop bugging me already!

Listen, you guys: If you fershlugginer, farblonget meeskeits don't stop hocking me a cheynik, I'll give you such a shlog in the kop, your keppele will look like a tzibboleh. Farshtay? So gay avek, already.

Most sincerely yours,
Lindsay MacIntyre, Jr.

Ties with Germany are solid

Reporting from Bonn, Sheldon Kirshner looks at the state of Israel's relations with Germany.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

After a two-year period of tension, climaxed by an emotional call from an Israeli cabinet minister to withdraw its ambassador in Bonn, Israel's relationship with Gemany is once more placid.

German and Israeli diplomats in Bonn grudgingly acknowledge that bilateral relations were ruffled by a series of incidents dating back to the 1990 crisis in the Middle East precipitated by Iraq's invasion of Kuwait.

But they steadfastly maintain that Israel's strategic friendship with Germany was never really at risk and always remained on a solid footing.

Tensions rose due to a number of factors — the sale of German-manufactured dual-use technology to Iraq before the 1991 Gulf War; the upsurge of neo-Nazism and anti-Semitism in Germany; Germany's denial, under American pressure, of loan guarantees to Israel; Germany's refusal to make restitution payments to Israel on behalf of the now-defunct East Germany; and the decision by German Chancellor Helmut Kohl to receive Kurt Waldheim, the Austrian president with a dubious past.

The 1990-91 crisis in the Persian Gulf, with its sobering revelations that German firms had illegally transferred sophisticated, potentially potent equipment to Israel's arch enemy, Iraq, aroused fury in Jerusalem.

Embarrassed by the disclosures, Germany launched a fence-mending campaign. Hans-Dietrich Genscher, the then-foreign minister, declared that Germany regarded Israel's security and its right to exist as a "moral imperative."

Then, in a gesture of solidarity following the launching of Iraqi Scud missiles against Israeli cities, Genscher visited bombed-out neighborhoods in Tel Aviv. And, more importantly, he offered humanitarian aid, Patriot missiles, two Dolphin submarines and specially-equipped armored vehicles. The package was valued at DM 1.4 billion.

Germany's assistance to Israel, combined with its pledge of $11 billion (US) to help defray the costs of the Gulf War, eased strains considerably.

Hard feelings were also assuaged by the passage of revised legislation in Germany to curb the export of arms to renegade nations such as Iraq, the arrest of German businessmen who had been involved in these clandestine transactions, and Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin's official visit to Germany in September 1992, during which he met with Kohl, the then-president, Richard von Weizsacker, the new foreign minister, Klaus Kinkel, and Defence Minister Volker Ruhe.

But within months of this event, another problem emerged to cloud the horizon.

With neo-Nazi violence increasing, and anti-Semitic manifestations on the rise, the-then Israeli health minister, Haim Ramon, recommended that Israel recall its ambassador for consultations as a form of protest. At the same time, the-then Israeli education minister, Shulamit Aloni, urged Israeli tourists to boycott Germany.

Meanwhile, placard-carrying protestors demonstrated in front of the German embassy in Tel Aviv, accusing the German government of being lax in the fight against neo-Nazism and anti-Semitism.

Taken aback by these reactions, Kinkel paid a visit to Israel, his first. In an attempt to assure Israelis that Germany intended to combat right-wing radicalism, he said: "If the impression has been created that we in Germany are blind in our right eye, then I must say that this is not true."

Subsequently, Germany took concrete steps to curb neo-Nazi outrages, but some Israelis were skeptical. In July 1993, the outgoing Israeli envoy to Germany, Benjamin Navon was quoted as saying that growing anti-Semitism had imposed a severe strain on relations. He called on Germany to take serious measures to contain neo-Nazism.

Amid these crises, Israel and Germany were faced with the necessity of putting out a series of smaller political brush fires.

☐At the request of the United States, Germany withheld loan guarantees, reportedly in the order of nearly $6 billion (US), for immigrant absorption. "Credit guarantees for Israel are not acceptable under the current circumstances," said Heinrich Lummer, a spokesman for Kohl's Christian Democratic Union party. "So long as Israel builds settlements in the occupied Palestinian territories... Germany should give no support."

In the end, a compromise was struck, with Germany giving Israel DM 140 million in aid for road construction and water works projects.

☐On a visit to Bonn in March 1991, David Levy, Israel's then-foreign minister, asked Germany to assume responsibility for an East German pledge of restitution funds to Israel. The issue was never resolved, though Germany has forwarded several billion marks worth of such payments to Israel since the 1950s.

☐In the wake of Kurt Waldheim's reception in Germany, Levy scolded Kohl, and the Knesset held a special session to discuss the incident. Kohl shrugged off the incident, and it faded away, causing no discernible harm to German-Israeli relations.

Although this relationship is haunted by the spectre of Nazi crimes against European Jewry, Israel's links with Germany are of the utmost importance, according to Miryam Shomrat, the second-ranking diplomat in Israel's embassy in Bonn, its largest in Europe. (Israel's ambassador was unavailable for an interview.)

"Due to the shadow of the Holocaust, you will never have 'normal' relations between Germany and Israel," she observed.

Nevertheless, as she pointed out, Israel's bilateral ties with Germany run "broad and deep" in fields ranging from trade to tourism.

A senior German diplomat, who has served in Israel and prefers to remain anonymous, agreed with her assessment.

"Despite the tensions of the past, the network of basic relations is strong and stable."

He added, "The real basis of our relationship is the interlocking grid of people-to-people ties, trade, political dialogue, tourism, youth exchanges and town twinnings."

Chancellor Helmut Kohl and Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin in Bonn, 1992.

It is not generally known that Germany is Israel's second biggest trading partner after the Unted States, and that Israel is Germany's chief trading partner in the Middle East.

In 1992, German exports to Israel totalled DM 3.2 billion. Israeli exports to Germany amounted to DM 1.4 billion. In the main, Germany sells machinery, cars and electronic and high-tech products to Israel. In turn, Germany buys computer technology, chemicals and fruits and vegetables from Israel.

With Israel and Germany putting the finishing touches on an economic agreement signed recently, the Israelis will certainly try to narrow the gap in their volume of trade with the Germans.

The passage of an anti-boycott law in Germany in July 1992 may well contribute to this process. The legislation, criticized by the Federation of German Wholesale and Foreign Trade, was keenly greeted in Israel. "We've had no complaints from Israel, so it must be working," said a German official.

German investments in Israel, primarily in hotels, banks and industry, are relatively substanial. One of the most prominent German investors is Ignatz Bubis, chair of the Central Council of Jews in Germany and a wealthy businessman. Among other things, he owns a 40 per cent chunk of the Sheraton Hotel in Tel Aviv.

Israeli investments in Germany, which are less weighty, are found mainly in computer technology.

Cultural relations are thriving, as evidenced by an eight-point protocol signed recently. "Interest in Israel and Jewish culture is genuine and is growing rapidly," a diplomat in Germany's embassy in Tel Aviv said last month.

Partnerships now link 87 German cities and districts with 62 Israeli localities, while German-Israeli youth exchanges involve 7,000 Germans and 3,000 Israelis.

Last year, 173,000 German tourists arrived in Israel, more than from any country except the United States. (By comparison, 38,000 Canadians and 170,000 Britons visited Israel.)

Defence cooperation between Germany and Israel appears to be growing.

Gen. Klaus Naumann, the chief of staff of the German armed forces, has visited Israel at the invitation of his Israeli counterpart, Gen. Ehud Barak, who recently repaid the visit. Barak thus became the first Israeli chief of staff to make an official trip to Germany.

Two years ago, the political director of Germany's defence ministry, Willy Weiner, paid a visit to Israel and revealed that the two countries are cooperating on security matters.

In 1993, the German defence minister was invited to Israel, and Rabin described his trip as a "further milestone" in German-Israel relations. Indeed, Rabin noted that Israel had better relations with Germany in the area of security policy than any other European country.

Observers believe that Germany purchases or has purchased Israeli weaponry, but details have not been divulged.

Viewed in its totality, Israel's bilateral ties with Germany can even be described as "special," notwithstanding surveys taken by the American Jewish Committee and Der Spiegel newsmagazine in 1991 and 1992 that indicated an increasing number of Germans reject that kind of relationship.

Addressing this issue, a German diplomat said that Germany has "special relationships" with only a few other nations apart from Israel — Russia, Poland, France and the United States.

Although Germany plays no leading role in the Middle East peace process, it takes part in the multilateral working group sessions on water resources, economic development, refugees, arms control and the environment.

Germany welcomed the September 1993 Declaration of Principles between Israel and the PLO. Germany has no official relations with the PLO, but the PLO maintains an observer's office in Bonn. In December 1993, the PLO's Yasser Arafat visited Bonn.

Together with other members of the European Union, Germany has extensive Palestinian aid programs in place in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Currently the largest European donor of assistance to the Palestinians there, Germany intends to open a representative office in the Palestinian autonomous areas. It will be an independent office, not affiliated with the German embassies in either Israel or Jordan.

In line with European Union policy, Germany opposes the presence of Jewish settlements in the territories. "They have no legal standing in international law and pose an obstacle to the peace process," a German diplomat said.

Germany, as well, does not recognize Israel's annexation of East Jerusalem, arguing that its final status can only be determined in Arab-Israeli negotiations.

Israel and Germany also hold differing opinions on Iran, an Islamic fundamentalist nation which does not even recognize Israel's existence.

Along with the United States, Israel wants to isolate Iran. But Germany, which has vital economic interests in Teheran, thinks that a "critical dialogue" with Iran can be of benefit to the entire region.

Mideast Analysis

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Germany has a new export control law which forbids the transfer of technology and equipment which could be used to build atomic, chemical and biological weapons of mass destruction.

Enacted about a year after the 1991 Gulf War, the legislation is aimed at loose-cannon countries like Iraq and Libya.

Miryam Shomrat, the second-ranking diplomat in the Israeli embassy in Bonn, believes that the law is exceedingly strict, certainly far stronger than that passed by any other country in Europe.

Nevertheless, Shomrat realizes that even the tightest controls are not foolproof "if people want to circumvent them."

This is precisely what happened following the passage of similar legislation in 1989. It was drafted in response to media disclosures that a German company had played a key role in the design and construction of a Libyan chemical factory in Rabta.

The 1989 curbs were contravened by private German companies. Their activities, of course, were illegal. But that didn't stop them from helping Saddam Hussein of Iraq to build a formidable war machine. Not only German firms were involved in these efforts. American, British, French, Austrian and Brazilian companies, among others, were implicated.

In any event, Iraq used German expertise in several related fields: to design, build and equip chemical weapons plants; to acquire deadly mycotoxins required in the production of biological weaponry; to develop its missile program; and to try to build a nuclear arsenal.

According to the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency, 13 companies, the majority German, supplied equipment for Iraq's ambitious nuclear program, including sophisticated machinery needed for the manufacture and assembly of centrifuge enrichment machines.

New German law

While government officials in Bonn maintain that the German companies were merely strands in an elaborate web of Iraqi contacts around the world, the fact is that German technology was crucial to Iraq.

Apart from know-how for the building of a gas centrifuge factory, German companies reportedly provided Iraq with ring magnets and a special grade of steel, both of which are vital in the production of nuclear weapons.

This was done illegally. However, Jurgen Moellmann, the former economics minister, has disclosed that some German companies acted legally in selling dual-use equipment to Iraq, which it used in its chemical and nuclear weapons programs.

According to the Wisconsin Project on Nuclear Arms Control, German firms sold many of the components which Iraq integrated into its Scud missile program. Anlagen Bau Contor supplied laboratory equipment; Aviatest built wind tunnels; Beaujean developed and supplied test stands for missile propulsion; BP, Carl Zeiss, Degussa and Tesa supplied training in missile electronics, wind tunnels and test facilities; Gildemeister provided machine tools, furnaces and control facilities; H&H Metalform supplied rocketry equipment and cylindrical presses; Heinrich Muller sold precision lathes; MBB and Transtechnica helped build a radar tracking station; Siemens supplied switching devices, transformers and electrical systems to control missile fuel production; Thyssen supplied turbo pumps.

Daimler-Benz, the automobile giant, was suspected of having sold heavy-duty trucks that Iraq converted into launching platforms for mobile Scuds.

A number of German businessmen were arrested in connection with illegally exporting equipment and materials to Iraq. But whether these arrests will be a deterrent in the future remains to be seen.

Under the new export control law, companies found guilty of violating its terms are subject to heavy fines, executives are subject to imprisonment, and judges are empowered to confiscate profits earned from illicit sales.

Will the legislation be effective? We will see. In the meantime, the words of German novelist Gunter Grass sound a warning: "When laws are passed to regulate the sending of arms to crisis regions, and nothing is done to enforce those laws, then those in political power are guilty."

Jewish leaders' meeting 'encourages' Zeitz-Pollard

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Esther (Elaine) Zeitz-Pollard of Toronto, who was reported to have married convicted spy for Israel Jonathan Pollard earlier this summer, said she was "very encouraged" by meetings she held here last week with President Ezer Weizman, Sephardi Chief Rabbi Eliahu Bakshi-Doron and Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu.

Elaine Zeitz-Pollard

Both Rabbi Bakshi-Doron and Netanyahu promised to visit Pollard in prison during their next visits to the U.S. and pledged firm support, Zeitz-Pollard said last Tuesday night.

She refused to divulge details of her private meeting with Weizman.

Zeitz-Pollard, a 39-year-old teacher of children with special needs, told the three that her husband is suffering from extreme conditions in his Butner, N.C. jail, where he is serving a life sentence, and that "he cannot go on much longer.

"My husband is a soldier who fought for Israel, was wounded, and was left in the field. It is inconceivable that at a time when Israel is freeing prisoners whose hands are drenched in the blood of innocent people, the man who did so much for [Israel] should be the one to stay in prison."

This past spring, U.S. President Bill Clinton denied a commutation of Pollard's sentence, despite intense pressure from groups around the world.

Palestinians rescue new Jewish resident

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — A new resident of the settlement of Talmon Bet, whose car broke down after he took a wrong turn near Ramallah and ended up surrounded by Palestinians throwing rocks at his car, was rescued by two Palestinians who took him in their car to the Ramallah police station.

"I was driving from Talmon to Jerusalem," said Ehud Gali, a National Religious Party activist and employee at the Chief Rabbinate, "when I took a wrong turn. My car broke down and I came under attack from a barrage of rocks. I got out of the car and walked in the other direction, and saw another group of Arabs coming at me with rocks."

Gali, who moved from Jerusalem to Talmon just last month, was unarmed. He said he confronted the Palestinians and asked what he had done, and that "it was in their interest" not to continue hurling rocks at his car.

"They asked if I was armed, and I said 'no,' that I would not do them any harm."

Gali, a veteran of an elite Army unit and who speaks fluent Arabic, said "all of a sudden a car came by and the two men inside told me to get in, that they would take me to Jerusalem. I asked if they were terrorists, or came to help. They said they were there to help."

Gali, who said he had gone through more harrowing experiences in the Army and as a member of the Golan settlement of Ramat Magshimim, when it was subjected to Syrian bombardment in the early 1970s, said, "I knew that I could not show I was frightened, that I could not panic. I understand the mentality."

Gali said the two men who picked him up were "very tense" because some of the Palestinians started running after their car. "They said that they were not going to take me to Jerusalem, but rather to the Army in Ramallah. They dropped me off at the police station and left.

"Everything is from Heaven," Gali said of the men who rescued him. "The whole incident is incredible."

Effi Arditti, deputy commander of the Judea District Police who confirmed that the incident took place, said Gali's car was found torched a short while later near Ramallah.

Comet blast foretold in Zohar: Lubavitcher

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — The comet fragments which struck Jupiter last month were a sign for all the world to see.

This, according to the International Campaign to Bring Moshiach, which last week issued a statement claiming the event was foretold in the Zohar, the 13th century Jewish mystical text.

Rabbi Shmuel Butman, chairman of the campaign and member of a follower of Lubavitch, said the smashing of fragments from the comet Shoemaker-Levy 9 into the planet Jupiter coincides with the arrival of the messianic era.

Rabbi Butman said the Zohar predicted that in messianic times the world would witness a "great fiery plume" streaking through space, striking a large planet "three times daily" and sending out "great flashes of light in all directions."

Twenty-one fragments from the comet struck Jupiter between July 16 and July 22, at an average rate of three per day. The dazzling light show produced by the impacts was broadcast on worldwide television.

The comet is believed to have been traveling through space for 4.5 billion years.

Rabbi Butman, a leader of the campaign to anoint the late Lubavitcher Rebbe Menachem Mendel Schneerson, as the messiah, said the world should know that redemption is near.

"You cannot dismiss something happening in the world and say, 'well, it just happened.'

"Nothing just happens," Rabbi Butman said.

Serbian Jews steering clear of nationalist politics

Children play in a Sarajevo park under the watch of UN peacekeepers. Serbia's Jewish community is laying low throughout the Bosnian crisis, preferring not to get entangled in the bloody three-way war. Life goes on, but anti-Semitism is never far below the surface. [RNS Photo/Reuters]

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

SUBOTICA, Yugoslavia — The Jews of Serbia, attempting to maintain a normal life against the backdrop of the Bosnian war, are steering clear of the nationalist politics that dominate discourse in all parts of the former Yugoslavia.

But, say community leaders, they feel isolated from the rest of world Jewry and are concerned that critical statements by foreign Jews about the Serbian role in Bosnia and Yugoslavia may boomerang back to harm the local Jewish community.

There has already been some evidence of officially inspired anti-Semitism in direct response to anti-Serb positions made by foreign Jewish organizations, the leaders say.

"There are Jewish organizations in the United States that are very critical of the Serbian role in the Yugoslav war," said David Albahari, president of the Federation of Jewish Communities in Yugoslavia.

Present-day Yugoslavia consists of the former republics of Serbia and Montenegro.

International Jewish organizations have the right to criticize, Albahari said in an interview during recent Holocaust commemoration ceremonies in the town of Subotica, on the Hungarian border.

"We are critical also," he said, referring to the private sentiments of many Serbian Jews.

But, he said, these organizations issue statements "that the Serbian press reprints in a way to make it seem that it is the Jews who are against the Serbs.

"This is leading to anti-Semitism, which unfortunately is becoming stronger," he said, citing as example the recent publication of the Protocols of the Elders of Zion in several publications.

He also said there have been "strong attacks on the Jews of the world on television and in the official newspapers."

"In the current situation, the Serbs explain everything in terms of a conspiracy against Serbs, so they speak about the international conspiracy of freemasons and Jews, and so on," he said.

"In such an atmosphere, it is easy to pick out Jews as targets. They fit easily into part of the 'conspiracy against the Serbs.' "

About 3,000 Jews live in the rump Yugoslavia. About 2,000 Jews live in the capital, Belgrade, and almost all the rest live in the Vojvodina province along the Hungarian border.

Many members of the community, particularly younger and middle-aged people, have left for Israel or elsewhere since the outbreak of the war in 1992.

Their departure has been somewhat countered, however, by the arrival in the community of Jewish refugees from Bosnia, and also by the formal affiliation of a number of younger Jews who had never before had formal contact with the community.

Serbia's Jews have attempted to maintain the full schedule of Jewish activities that went on before the war, despite physical isolation and hardships brought on by the UN sanctions.

The international community imposed sanctions as a result of Serbian President Slobodan Milosevic's military and financial support for the Bosnian Serbs.

The monthly Jewish Federation bulletin for July/August reads almost like any other community newsletter, describing the activities of the sisterhood, the formation of a Maccabee sports club, plans for sending young people to the Jewish summer camp in Hungary, Holocaust commemorations, renovation work at the Jewish museum, death notices, exhibitions and the like.

One section of the bulletin also tracks anti-Semitism, noting that, as in other countries, anti-Semitic material is turning up on local computer networks.

Serbia's Jews have only one rabbi, Cadik Danon, who is frail and elderly. A local young man is currently in Israel training for the rabbinate, and his return is eagerly anticipated.

"The new rabbi will mean a lot for the community," Albahari said. "The Jewish community here is predominately secular.

"He will be able to bring activity to religious life in Belgrade and all of Serbia," Albahari said. "I'm sure he will find the ways to deal with people who want to go to synagogue and have not done so before."

Albahari and other members of the community stressed that Serbia's Jews had to steer clear of politics.

"We've decided not to interfere in daily politics," said Judita, a teacher who gave only her first name.

"No one is in political parties. Of course we are all unhappy because of the war. We have opinions, but in public we are not political," she said.

According to Mira Poljakovic, the president of the Yugoslav Jewish Women's Organization, "It is very difficult to stay out of the war, but we Jews cannot be involved in politics.

"We are only Jews. We belong to the Jewish federation of the world; that's our world," she said, adding that "the war is not our business."

"Our first decision is that we cannot take sides," said Albahari.

"If we were to accept the idea that we were to be a political loudspeaker for the 'Serbian cause,' we realize that we would be simply abused. At least one thing we have learned from history is that sooner or later (Jews) will become a target whatever you say."

In addition, he said, "we wanted to show and to prove to important world Jewish organizations that they should not get involved politically in this situation by taking sides. Their role should be humanitarian."

Albahari said major Jewish organizations such as the Joint Distribution Committee, the Jewish Agency and the World Jewish Congress have "accepted our advice.

"They didn't issue political statements that could hurt anyone here, but are all the time still active in humanitarian operations," he said.

Albahari also said that Serbia's Jews feel isolated from the rest of the Jewish world. They feel that Jews outside refrain from direct contact because of their opposition to Serbian policy.

"One thing that keeps surprising us is that there are Jewish organizations and individuals who simply would not come here because it wouldn't be comfortable with their image.

"We haven't had (many) people coming here and asking us as Jews what about our needs, our concerns, on a Jewish level.

"They all went to Croatia, Sarajevo," Albahari said. "No one will ask people coming here to shake hands with Milosevic; but the Jewish community of Serbia should be of concern to the Jewish community of the world."

He and local leaders of the 200-member Subotica Jewish community said it was an illustration of the Serbian Jewish community's isolation that no fo[illegible] Jewish representatives, not even from neighboring Hungary, attended the two-day ceremony here last month, in which a monument was dedicated to the 4,000 Jews deported and killed in 1944.

VICTORIA — An anti-fascist coalition is being formed to fight neo-Nazi activities in Victoria but organizers have asked not to be identified to prevent possible reprisals.

"It sounds paranoid," one woman told the Times-Colonist newspaper, "but these are creepy people and you can't take them lightly. They are quite ruthless."

The coalition was launched at a closed meeting in Camosun College on July 26. Volunteers trained in "non-confrontational crowd control" were recruited for the meeting.

The CJN was told the Greater Victoria Regional District race relations committee is not officially involved with the coalition, but members of the committee were invited to participate.

Nor is there any official representation from Jewish organizations here, although the social action committee of Congregation Emanu-El was represented at the meeting.

A race relations committee official told The CJN he was annoyed the Times-Colonist announced the time and location of the meeting in advance. "It was like they were asking for trouble so they could get a few good pictures," he said.

The Times-Colonist reported that a pamphlet has been distributed throughout the city headlined: Shut 'Em Down. Kick the Fascist Canadian Front out of Victoria. The pamphlet says the city has recently been subjected to a wave of racist, neo-Nazi activity. Since June, "white supremacists have committed several disgusting acts of racial intimidation."

The pamphlet claims a group calling itself the Canadian Front has repeatedly plastered the windows of Everywoman's Bookstore with anti-choice posters, stickered the downtown area with swastikas, left calling cards at an East Indian restaurant and dropped bundles of anonymous racist leaflets around the University of Victoria campus.

The newspaper quotes one of the organizers of the anti-fascist group as saying much of the energy to counteract right wing groups has come from the university and Camosun, a community college.

"We have heard," the source reported, "that the neo-Nazis will be out in full force during the Commonwealth Games which open in Victoria on August 18."

The pamphlet has an illustration showing a hand pulling a weed out of the ground and a slogan saying: "There is a need to put out the fascist weeds or they will take over the whole garden. Pull 'em up before they take root."

The meeting was by invitation only. It was not a forum for neo-Nazis to speak, said the organizer. "We want to build alliances among people."

Media representatives were not allowed to attend.

Bosnian Jewish business expands

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — The Menorah Club, a group of Bosnian Jewish refugees who a little over six months ago set up a business producing handmade yarmulkes, has had such success that it has expanded its operations.

The club, begun under the sponsorship of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, started with about 20 mainly elderly refugees who were staying at a Jewish refugee center in Makarska, on the Croatian coast.

Hundreds of Jews have fled Bosnia since war broke out over two years ago when Bosnia declared independence from the former Yugoslavia.

Today, the club has 33 members — all but two of them women — living and sewing in Makarska, in nearby Split, and in the Croatian capital of Zagreb.

"The club has enjoyed encouraging success, having supplied more than 2,200 skullcaps so far to various communities, organizations, and individuals in Belgium, Canada, France, Israel, the United Kingdom and the United States," said a JDC staff member involved in the project.

"So far, they have divided among them more than $7,000 (US) in wages. When all the orders are paid for, the total profits to date should reach $2,500 to $3,000," he said.

"We're swamped with work," Lenka Bilalagic-Montiljo, the leader of the Menorah Club, said in an interview published this month in the Sarajevo Jewish community's bulletin.

"Every member of the club makes 50 kipot a month," she said, adding that the best worker in the group is 90-year-old Slavica Bernard.

Those purchasing skullcaps demonstrate their concern for Bosnian refugees and their compatriots still living in Sarajevo, Bosnia's war-torn capital, said Bilalagic-Montiljo, adding they have orders from all over the world.

Bilalagic-Montiljo said that each skullcap costs about $7. Of that, half goes to the person who made it; $2 goes toward purchase of materials; and the remaining dollar goes to a fund for the restoration of the Split synagogue.

The kipot may be ordered — individually or in bulk — through the JDC, 711 Third Ave., New York, N.Y. 10017, U.S.A. Fax: (212) 370-5467. Tel: (212) 687-6200, ext. 254. Attn: Myriam Feldman or Marion Krug.

Demonstration turns into riot

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — Israeli police arrested some 25 ultra-Orthodox Jews in the Jaffa quarter of Tel Aviv last week after a demonstration against archaeological excavations turned into a riot.

The demonstration involving more than 100 people turned violent last Wednesday when protesters began attacking the police. Some of the protesters overturned a jeep belonging to the Antiquities Authority.

Most of those arrested were released by Wednesday evening, but a few were held in custody for further questioning.

The manager of the site, Yossi Levy, said the demonstration will not stop work on the dig.

Religious groups frequently have held protests at archaeological sites in recent months, claiming the remains being dug up were those of Jews.

But archaeologists at the Jaffa site say the graves being investigated are those of Muslims and Christians dating back to the Byzantine period.

A yeshivah student was arrested three weeks ago for allegedly stealing bones from the site after tying up and beating a guard.

The excavations are being carried out prior to the construction of several hundred new apartment buildings in the Jaffa quarter. Archaeologists are concerned that the construction will destroy all artifacts at the site.

The excavations in Jaffa, like those elsewhere in Israel, are permitted by the attorney general on condition that if human remains are found at any sites, they will be transferred to the Religious Affairs Ministry for examination and re-burial.

Raising awareness of the 'deaf culture'

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Beverley Anker, 43, would like to bridge the gap between deaf and hearing people. She feels that hearing people "are afraid to communicate with us, or don't know how," she said during a recent interview at her North York home.

Anker, who became the first woman president of the Toronto Jewish Association of the Deaf (TJAD) last November, hopes that the upcoming 20th Bienniel National Congress of Jewish Deaf Convention will raise awareness of the "deaf culture" among members of the hearing community. Over 200 people have already registered for the convention, which will be held August 7-14 at the Sheraton Centre Hotel. Most of the registrants are North American, but there are some from as far away as England and Israel.

"Hearing people think we're different. We're not," says Anker, a mother of three teenagers (two hearing and one hard of hearing).

Beverley Anker

Anker has worked for the past 13 years as a data output clerk at American Express. A native of Montreal, she was educated at the Montreal Oral School for the Deaf before switching to a hearing school in junior high.

Anker, who was born deaf, can hear sounds such as background noises. She learned to speak at a young age, and while her speech lacks the intonation and precision of a hearing person's, it is no more difficult to understand than a foreign accent. She relies mainly on lipreading to understand hearing people.

Hearing people can enhance communication with deaf people by the use of written language, gestures and facial expressions, she said.

She is happy to have received a good education and proud that her parents raised her in a Jewish atmosphere, she said. After high school she worked for two years as a bookkeeper at a Montreal synagogue, where she learned a lot about Judaism, she added.

Anker moved to Toronto in 1973 with her then-husband. Divorced when their children were young, she remarried in 1987. Like Anker, her husband is both deaf and Jewish.

Although Anker says it's not uncommon to have a marriage in which both partners are deaf Jews, she notes that deaf Jews make up a small segment of the population, and she estimates that more than 40 per cent of deaf Jews are not involved with the Jewish deaf community. TJAD has a mailing list of about 140 people, representing a fraction of a percent of Toronto's Jewish community of 160,000. She noted that the upcoming convention is a place where singles can meet.

TJAD traces its roots back to the 1930s, when the late Joe Rosnick founded the Toronto Hebrew Association for the Deaf which became the Toronto Association for the Deaf in the late 1940s and ran as a secular group until last year.

In the 1960s Eddy Wiesblatt started a small group for deaf Jews, with Rosnick's encouragement. The club faltered in the mid-'70s, but with the help of volunteers from National Council of Jewish Women, who initiated the idea of restarting a group for the Jewish deaf, the club took off again a few years later. Because TTY (telecommunications for the deaf) had come into common use, the timing was opportune.

TJAD activities include social events and celebration of Jewish holidays. The group has received funding from B'nai Brith for the convention and is seeking additional funding to pay for interpreters for their general programming so that hearing people can participate. (All sessions at the convention will have an interpreter.)

"I'd like to welcome anyone to TJAD," said Anker. The group also hopes to have their own place to meet (currently they meet at Council House).

WJCC approves 1994/95 budget

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Winnipeg Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Winnipeg Jewish Community Council (WJCC) has approved a hold-the-line budget for 1994-95.

"Our total projected expenses for the next fiscal year [which runs from Sept. 1 to August 31] are $588,173," reports Jack Cipilinsky, the WJCCs director of finance. "That is about $1,000 less than last year.

"We want to make sure that we aren't increasing our budget when our revenues are decreasing. We also want to set an example for our beneficiaries. We have to lead the way."

Cipilinsky said that while there have been more donators in recent years, the overall monies raised by the annual fundraising campaign have decreased. Some large donors have left the city while others have passed away.

"We are making inroads," Cipilinsky reported. "The decrease in the campaign's revenues was slight and we hope to start turning it around."

Last year, he said, WJCC staff salaries were frozen. This year, staff members can look forward to a 1.5 per cent across the board raise plus an additional .5 per cent for some due to changes in job descriptions. To make up for the increase, Cipilinsky said WJCC planners reduced other lines.

Book recounts Poles' heroism in helping to save Jews

By CELINE MIGDAL
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL — A collaboration between two unlikely partners, Tecia Werbowski, a Polish Jew and Irene Tomaszewski, a Polish Christian, has produced a book with the intriguing title of Zegota.

The book, launched recently at a gala reception at the Polish Consulate, is a compilation of remarkable stories of heroic deeds performed by ordinary people under conditions of extraordinary terror during the Nazi occupation of Poland. These Poles risked their lives and their families to save others.

Zegota was a code name by an underground organization in Poland during World War II, established for the purpose of saving Jews. During the war, secrecy was vital to its success and to the survival of its members. After the war, many members, including those of the Polish underground, deemed it wiser to remain silent, in order to be safe from the new terror of the Communist regime.

Werbowski, a social worker, arrived in Canada with her family in 1968 and met Tomaszewski last year after reading her article on the Warsaw Ghetto uprising in the Toronto Star. Tomaszewski, a Montreal writer, was 10 years old when she emigrated with her family to Canada after the war. She conceived the book with Werbowski because both wanted to break down the stereotype of the anti-Semitic Pole.

"What most people don't understand," said Tomaszewski, "is that helping Jews in Poland was not just an act of decency or moral courage — it also meant risking the lives of your children and family."

After their initial meeting, the two realized that they had the same goal in mind — to honor those courageous, forgotten heroes, who risked their lives for others.

The authors found many of the sources for the book through friends and acquaintances. Werbowski said she had tea many times with Polish friends in Montreal, and "I never knew some of these people were part of Zegota or that my father forged documents to help Jews escape, until I started working on this book with Irene."

The authors interviewed the rescuers and the rescued, both in Poland and North America, and researched wartime memoirs and texts.

Dr. Victor Goldbloom, Canada's commissioner of official languages said about the authors, "They have ensured that heroism and altruism will not be forgotten or ignored, that tragic and complex events will not be perceived simplistically or stereotypically . . ."

Malgorzata Dzieduszyscka, consul general of Poland, said in part, that the book celebrated a . . . "get together between Jews and Poles and marked a page in history not to be forgotten."

'He or she who saves one human life has saved humanity'

Pierre Sevigny, one of the keynote speakers at the reception, said that "this story should have been told long ago — it's not a pretty story, it's full of fears, tears and unbelievable cruelty, that of organized and premeditated genocide; but it's also a story of love — people who exposed themselves to death to save others."

He said that generations of today should know and learn from the past and see hope where there was none. "Against impossible odds, some men and women in Poland saw their duty in helping the helpless and they should be honored."

Alan Rose, executive vice-president for Canadian Jewish Congress, said that on behalf of the Jewish community he wanted to "pay homage to the ordinary men and women who faced the Nazi onslaught and risked their own lives to save Jews in Poland. He or she who saves one human life — has saved humanity."

Also addressing the assembled guests was Michael Price, the publisher of Zegota and Dr. Ilona Gruda, of the Jewish Polish Heritage Foundation.

Shulamit Zabinska, who arrived in Montreal from Vilna four years ago, remembers fondly her protectors and friends Weronika Stankiewicz and Julia Stanilko. "Without their help, I would not be here; Julia brought food for my family in the ghetto, slipping it under a gate. Some Poles did that; otherwise we would all have starved. And Weronika sheltered me together with her old, ill mother in a one-room cabin, when I escaped from the ghetto — when to help a Jew meant certain death. And she nursed me back to health when I was released from Stutthof concentration camp, ill with tuberculosis, because my entire family perished in the Holocaust," she said. "It's important to honor those few who had the courage to stand up to Nazi tyranny and help the victims. Their dedication and humanity must not be forgotten but must be an inspiration to future generations."

Richard Kalinowicz a former member of Zegota who now lives in Montreal with his wife Irene, two children and four grandchildren, was able to pass for a non-Jew because of his appearance and linguistic abilities and assumed many nationalities in order to help other Jews escape and hide from the Nazis. He said that Zegota was instrumental in helping hundreds if not thousands of Jews by forging passports, arranging for shelters and false food cards and smuggling some Jews through Nazi lines.

One time, he recalls, he impersonated a Swiss Red Cross Official. Carrying a false passport, he boldly entered a labor camp. "The Nazis saluted me, they were good at that, . . . and I took out Jurek Hamerschmidt, a Jew. He was very frightened; I had to tell him to walk slowly, not to run . . . it was very close." Poles and Jews cooperated in Zegota and worked as one. "We all felt that we were simply members of the human race," he said.

A petition to President Lech Walesa of Poland to honor Polish citizens who were members of Zegota was signed by many of the well-wishers, Jews and Poles, who filled the main reception room of the consulate for the book launch.

Camp offers program for special needs children

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

BALFOUR BEACH — Andrea Cohen, 22, has been spending her summers at Camp Katonim on Lake Simcoe from the time she was a toddler. So it was only natural for her, when she landed a summer job working with a special needs child, to take her young charge back to the site where she had been a camper, counsellor and head of the waterski program.

That experience two years ago was the impetus for what has become known as the SCIP program (Summer Camp Integration Project) which Cohen now runs at the camp.

Michael Forbes, now 8, has been joined by three other special needs children, and there are now five SCIP facilitators, most of whom are university students.

Michael uses a wheelchair because of cerebral palsy (CP), a condition caused by brain damage at or before birth, resulting in muscle spasticity and/or weakness. He communicates by using a book of pictures and symbols, and uses body language to indicate yes (by kicking his legs) or no (by turning his head).

Cohen, a Kinesiology student entering her fourth year at MacMaster University in Hamilton, met Michael when she taught swimming at the Hugh MacMillan Rehabilitation Centre in Toronto.

She had become interested in working with special needs children as a high school student in Toronto while working at CARD (Community Association for Riding for the Disabled). At the time she wanted to be a veterinarian, but by her second month at CARD she was saying, "Forget the horses. I want to work with the kids."

Her goal of having campers and staff communicating with Michael by using his book was realized within three days, Cohen recalls. "Of course, our number one goal is having fun," she said, and fun means participating in every camp activity, just like the other boys in his group.

Instead of standing on waterskis, Michael sits on Cohen's lap in a plastic "ski basket." For tennis, he uses a walker which allows him to move quickly, while Cohen holds the raquet with him. On the beach, he sits in a low plastic chair to play in the sand, and gets one-on-one attention in the water.

Michael travels to camp on the regular camp bus, where he uses a car seat. (Although Katonim, a predominantly Jewish day camp, was started 49 years ago for children of local cottagers, in recent years children have been bussed in from Toronto, one hour away.) "I didn't want a wheelchair bus," said Cohen, who wants Michael's experience to be as much like that of the other campers as possible.

"I wanted it to not be any trouble for the camp," she says. Indeed, Katonim had to make very few accommodations for its first wheelchair user.

Ramps were already in place to accommodate strollers for preschoolers. Only one physical change was necessary: the beach changerooms were not previously wheelchair accessible.

The kids welcomed him "with open arms," said Cohen. "Michael was the perfect kid to break down the walls. He can give a lot to the camp, and he can get a lot from the camp."

Rob Fishbaum, camp director, says the SCIP program has been "good for everyone." Recently he saw two campers talking about pushing Michael's wheelchair. "I want a turn," said the first one. "You can't just have a turn," said the second. "You have to ask Michael if it's okay."

Cohen believes that Michael's integration was made easier because so many of the children knew her from previous years and because she and Michael were open to answering all of their questions.

Currently she is working on a children's book based on Michael's experience at Katonim. SCIP program volunteer Michael Anthony, a high school student with a mild form of CP is working on the book with her.

"Michael likes the beach," a smiling Michael tells The CJN, targeting the appropriate pictures in his book.

Making the going easier

The Institute for Community Education and Referral, conceived and funded by Benjamin's, was created in 1986. Benjamin's felt that the sanctity of life demonstrated in treatment of the deceased had to be reflected in greater care for the living as well. The Institute fills, in part, the vacuum left by vanishing traditions of community support for people adjusting to great or sudden personal loss.

The Institute serves as an educational resource on death, funeral practices and Jewish laws and traditions, in addition to helping with needed attention. Individuals or families served by the Chapel may receive clinical assessments, short-term psychological support or referrals to accredited professionals upon request or at the suggestion of the director at the time arrangements are made. Counselling costs are either fully borne or subsidized by Benjamin's to reduce any barrier to help.

Several mailings describing the Institute's services are sent out well after a funeral. Some people need time before recognizing the need for, or accepting professional help. Families occasionally contact the agency for help in coping before a loss occurs. Whatever information or clinical services may be required, the Benjamin Institute is a unique community resource dedicated to facilitating the way life goes on.

Expert: peace will continue to unfold

By PHILLIP FINE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Mideast peace process, barring some major upheaval, is irreversible, an Israeli foreign affairs official said recently.

At a downtown lunch-time discussion sponsored by B'nai Brith Canada's Institute of International Affairs, Dr. Yehoyada Haim said that, despite the concerns that still exist, the path to peace will continue to unfold, simply because there is little likelihood of war.

He believes the developing middle class in Arab lands seeks a stability that makes it unlikely their countries will go to war.

"Today, for the Saudis and the Gulf countries, the Palestinian issue is not an issue," the Israeli official told the group.

Haim said that Israel still has many questions about the outcome of the fledgling experiment in Palestinian self-rule.

For one thing, he said, there is concern over whether Yasser Arafat will be able to change the Palestine Liberation Organization from a terrorist group to a functioning government.

And some have misgivings about Arafat's ability to become democratic enough for those Palestinians who have developed a taste for democracy through contact with Israel.

Turning to recent developments, Haim said Jordan's desire for American aid was the main reason King Hussein decided to come to the peace table. However, the result is that Israel will now be able to discuss such contentious issues as borders and water.

With Syria, Haim believes peace negotiations will not progress because Damascus will always insist that Israel first withdraw from the Golan Heights.

But Syria, he explained, is not likely to take up the cudgels, since Russia will no longer supply it with weapons.

Helping ORT gives volunteer naches

Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Lily Silver, honoree at Toronto ORT's Golden Circle Luncheon held recently at the home of Florence and Sydney Cooper, praised the organization for giving her such naches.

Silver, formerly of Toronto, is a past president of Toronto Women's ORT and a member of the executive of Women's ORT in Jerusalem where she now resides.

"I am proud to be part of an organization which has allowed people in Israel to learn a trade or profession and become independent. To this day, I marvel at what ORT does. Since I've lived in Israel, I am happy to see that it is prestigious to be an ORT student. In Israel, an ORT student is a somebody," she said.

In her honor, a $50,000 (US) Lily Silver Perpetual Scholarship will be established at the Joseph Harmatz School of Engineering on the campus of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem.

David Hermelin, president, World ORT Union and keynote speaker at the luncheon said that we all share the same love affair with ORT.

"If ORT did not already exist," he said, "the Jewish people today would have invented it. It is unbelievable that this philosophical movement has always been productive and carried us through the time in Eastern Europe.

"There are many successful people in the world who say their life began in displaced persons' camps with ORT."

He said that with 400,000 ORT graduates in Israel, there is probably no family that has not been touched by the organization.

"When the Soviet Union opened its doors or the Ethiopians came to Israel, who taught them?" he asked. "ORT is in the forefront of all those activities. ORT is everywhere, and where there are Jews, there is ORT."

Hermelin said that ORT is also in the forefront of computer literacy and using ORTNET, Jews everywhere can hook into programs on Hebrew, Jewish customs or Chumash.

He said that the price of success however "is that we need working capital and ORT is the best deal for the money. Be part of an ORT project because an independent economy is a strong building block for peace in Israel."

Ruth Druxerman, immediate past president of Toronto Women's ORT and a co-chair of the Golden Circle Luncheon with Helen Friedman said that this 20th year of successful Golden Circles is the biggest year yet.

Pins were given out to Golden Circle donors and a top fundraising award was given to Bertha Dermer, national Golden Circle chair and past president, Toronto Women's ORT.

Karen Eltis, fourth from left, learned firsthand what it's like to be a Surete du Quebec police officer under a summer program for young people from ethnic and native communities.

Montreal teen goes on beat with Quebec provincial police

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — For six weeks this summer, Karen Eltis — a nice Jewish girl from Cote St. Luc — patrolled the highways of the North Shore with the Surete du Quebec (SQ) and got an insiders' look at how crime is solved.

Eltis, 18, was one of eight young people from ethnic and native communities chosen for a program designed to "demystify" the work of the provincial police and to develop "ambassadors" within their respective communities.

The Marianopolis College graduate spent four of the six weeks with the SQ's Lachenaie post, going out in the cruiser every day with her partner, officer Claude Lavoie. She manned the radar and took fingerprints.

Highlights included an all-night search in the woods for a missing pregnant woman, and talking a youth out of suicide.

In these situations and elsewhere, she said she was struck by the patience and devotion of the police. "It really opened my eyes," she said.

"I never would have foreseen the profound manner with which these six weeks have affected me, nor imagined the value of the cultural exchange that took place," said Eltis, a poised young woman soon to begin studying political science at McGill University. She hopes to become a lawyer.

She said she was welcomed with kindness and understanding by the officers at her post. She entered the program expecting to face certain prejudices.

"On the contrary, I was completely accepted, but I was happy to find a number of the police were well-informed about the Jewish people," she said. All encouraged her to share with them her reality, while she learned about theirs.

Eltis is fluent in French, having graduated from Herzliah High School's francophone section. Her parents, born in Romania, are from Israel.

The program, now in its fourth year, has a two-part objective: these young people will return to their communities with a new and hopefully positive view of the SQ, and the officers they work with will gain insight into the cultures of minorities and aboriginals.

Although not its main goal, the program — called Projet Defi 2000 — may also spark an interest in a police career. The SQ acknowledges that those who are not old-stock francophones are under-represented on the 4,500-member force. No Jews are known to be on the SQ, and Eltis was the first Jewish youth to participate in Defi 2000.

Eltis now plans to go into Jewish schools, possibly with an SQ officer, and talk about police work. She would also like to bring Jewish kids up to her Lachenaie station.

"Police work has always fascinated me," she said. Active in Jewish student causes, she has noticed the police often on duty at rallies. "But they are always seen from afar. There is little communication. We don't understand each other's culture; there are a lot of misconceptions."

For Defi 2000, the SQ looks for young people 18 and over who are in college, knowledgeable about their communities and able to speak and write French well. They must receive a recommendation from a leader of their community. Eltis's was written by Rabbi Reuben Poupko of Beth Israel Beth Aaron Congregation.

The eight candidates, known as stagiaires, spent three days at the SQ's Montreal headquarters on Parthenais Street and the police academy in Nicolet before being sent to their posts.

The stagiaires worked 40-hour weeks and were paid according to government scale. They were, of course, unarmed and were not taken along on patrol when there was any danger, said community relations director Lt. Louis Boudreault. They cannot, however, be shielded from such unpleasant facts as traffic accidents.

"This is not a holiday," he said. "They are expected to earn their pay."

The stagiaires wore the regular SQ khaki pants and black boots, but were set apart by their white T-shirts.

Both Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith have given the program a thumbs-up as an effective means of promoting rapprochement.

The other stagiaires this year were from the Lebanese, Salvadoran and Nicaraguan communities, and the Algonquin and Montagnais bands.

Hooked on learning

TORONTO — Imagine a school where students learn without pressure and teachers never have to discipline their classes.

There are no tests, grades or report cards. The material covered is challenging but non-threatening. Students come early to prepare their lessons and instructors linger after the sessions end to answer questions or clarify ideas.

At the Institute for Jewish Learning (IJL), Chevra, which means friends or community, uses a curriculum developed by the Florence Melton Centre at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

A two-year, comprehensive overview of Judaism, it is described by Mark Charendoff, IJL director, as "a kind of conversion course for people who are already Jewish."

For thirty weeks a year, on Tuesday evenings, the class members explore their roots. After the first few sessions they are hooked on Jewish learning and connect as a close social group.

But the real heart of the program's success is the faculty. They inspire the students to become independent Jewish learners — to explore and to experience, to challenge and define what Judaism means to them. The curriculum has expanded outside the actual classroom to include experiences such as Shabbat dinners, sessions in a sukkah and Chanukah parties.

The graduating class has requested that the program be expanded to include a third-year program for those wishing more advanced studies. "We've only just begun to crack the surface," one student explains. They have already begun what they call Chevra III: The Year After, in which they will continue with their weekly studies.

Baycrest's new program provides client liaison

TORONTO — Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care has recently established a new Client Representative Program.

Although client representatives are often found in acute care facilities, they are new to long-term care institutions. Baycrest has a long-standing commitment to soliciting feedback either directly from clients or through councils, forums and staff consultations.

The new service, available to recipients of Baycrest's many programs and services, will enhance these channels by providing an independent liaison to whom people have direct access.

"As their representative, I'm here to offer clients and their families assistance in communicating concerns and resolving problems," says Brenda Conway, who was recently appointed to the position.

Conway is a sociologist with experience in eldercare services, as well as the daughter of a patient in Baycrest Hospital, which gives her a personal perspective on long-term care issues.

"There are good communication mechanisms in place at Baycrest," she says, "but sometimes it is helpful to have another person facilitate the resolution of issues. This service offers families an additional resource."

Her first step is to encourage people to speak with their head nurse, social worker or physician, or to approach client and family councils.

"If there is no resolution, or if they feel uncomfortable coming forward with a problem," she explains, "they can talk with me and together we can find a way to handle it."

The client representative's role at Baycrest differs somewhat from a similar position in an acute care facility where patient stays are generally shorter.

Conway has the opportunity to actively solicit feedback from clients and build long-term relationships so that, as issues arise, they can work them through together.

Brenda Conway

She also works, either directly or behind the scenes, as a consultant to staff, families and committees on issues of concern. People need to hear good news, too, says Conway, so she is available to receive compliments as well as complaints.

By providing this kind of personalized service, she explains, Baycrest is making every effort to hear what clients have to say, so that services can be improved and the best possible care can be delivered.

Beit Dagan undergoes radical transformation

TORONTO — Eight years ago, Beit Dagan, south-east of Tel Aviv, was a town in which few wanted to live — even the residents.

Heroin use was widespread. Fifty-two per cent of the student population had dropped out, and only three per cent of those who remained actually graduated from secondary school.

Today, thanks to United Jewish Appeal's (UJA) Project Renewal, there's a new civic pride in Beit Dagan.

Project Renewal started 16 years ago as a means by which world-wide UJA cities could, in effect, adopt an Israeli community with special problems. Beit Dagan is one of three municipalities assigned to Toronto.

So far, UJA has spent more than a million dollars to stop the town's disintegration.

"Beit Dagan was the drug hot-spot of the country," notes Laura Kindler, UJA's Israeli representative for Project Renewal. "Dealers used to arrive from the airport in untraceable taxicabs."

Among the many remedial measures adopted by Beit Dagan was the formation of a civil guard that closed off entrances to the town.

In Toronto, UJA's Bryan Keshen also cites an education program for parents about the consequences faced by their drop-out children. "We showed them the connection between education and army units," he says.

Students who failed to pass their national matriculation exams were shunted to low end army tasks, if they were admitted at all.

UJA also helped to set up a mentor program for older children to counsel their younger friends and neighbors.

As a result of Beit Dagan's emergency action plan, the town's drop-out rate has plummeted to just under seven per cent this year. More than 30 per cent of students have matriculated, and no child has been arrested in Beit Dagan for nearly a year and a half.

Even the mayor, Eli Dadon, was one of the youngsters who benefited from Project Renewal.

"Beit Dagan had a shrinking population," observes Laura Kindler on the scene. "Today, 800 new apartment units are being built. Real estate values are rising. It's a great location."

Robert Harlang, who along with Billy Kassel recently visited Beit Dagan as co-chairs of Toronto's Project Renewal committee, offers a simple summation of the transformation.

"Now, no one's embarrassed about living there."

BILL GLADSTONE'S

EYE ON ARTS

Joe Rotman & The Barnes Exhibit: The cover story of the current issue of the Financial Post magazine explains how Toronto snagged the phenomenal assortment of impressionist canvases known as the Barnes Collection, which opens at the Art Gallery of Ontario Sept. 17.

After initially deciding against Toronto, the Barnes committee was swayed to reverse itself through the determined efforts of 59-year-old Toronto businessman-philanthropist Joe Rotman, AGO president since 1993, who reportedly refused to take no for an answer.

A home-heating czar who parlayed his wealth into a diverse financial empire, Rotman reportedly fought for the art show as hard as he might have fought for anything in any of his own companies.

Holding surveys that showed that the Barnes Collection would bring 50,000 visitors to Toronto and pump $35 million and 1,000 jobs into the local economy, he quickly got Premier Bob Rae onside and raised the necessary $1.5 million in corporate support from Gluskin Sheff & Associates, Inc., and other sponsors. Then he pulled every string he could, making lobbyists of influential colleagues such as Canada's former ambassador to the United States, Allan Gotlieb, international hotelier Izzy Sharp, and land developer Murray Frum.

The Barnes is expected to provide a much-needed financial boost to the AGO, whose ledgers have shown so much red ink in recent years that the institution was forced to close down for seven months in 1992. In only a few months since tickets became available, more than 100,000 have been snapped up by eager buyers, making this the fastest-selling exhibition in the Gallery's history.

From Cezanne to Matisse: Great French Paintings from The Barnes Foundation features masterpieces by 15 of the best known and most admired artists of all time, including Renoir, Monet, Matisse, van Gogh, Cezanne, Picasso and Modigliani. The show has attracted record crowds and millions of people in Washington, Paris and Tokyo.

"This exhibition sold out in Paris and Tokyo and I urge those who have not yet ordered their tickets to do so quickly," says AGO director Glenn Lowry.

Tickets ($15 for adults) may be purchased at the AGO (no handling charge) or through TicketKing at (416) 872-3333 or 1-800-461-3333.

At the Koffler Gallery: The Order of Things, the first Toronto showing by Vancouver artist Lee Goreas, is on view through Sept. 18. Here's what a Koffler press release says about the exhibit: "As a collection of multiples, Goreas' work can be installed in a variety of arrangements and this fragmentation of the picture plane subverts painting's traditional narrative function and undermines its cultural authority as an icon of authenticity and originality." Get the picture?

Another show, Wurmhole, by Fastwurms, parodies the popular 1960s TV series Star Trek. To Sept. 18. (416) 636-2145.

Toronto Street Festival: Friday August 5 to Sunday August 14, the second annual Circle Ball Fair explodes in the Bloor-Yorkville area of Toronto. Street performers include acrobats, singers, dancers, jugglers, comics, story-tellers, stilt-walkers, mime artists and street painters. All performances are free, but donations on August 13 will benefit REACH for the Rainbow Children s Foundation, whose mandate is to integrate disabled children into the community.

Department of Nepotism: Known as The Acoustics, a trio of musicians — Martin Gladstone, Marci Wilson and Rob Binstock — who hail from the Jewish community of north Toronto, have recently recorded a remarkable first album, All In The Name of Love. It contains a diverse assortment of pop-folk tunes, with many jazz and blues overtones, refreshing '60s sounds, touches of Latin and ragtime and aboriginal rhythms, outstanding vocal harmonies, and the musicianship of more than a dozen quality performers.

One song, Here We Go Again, sounds remarkably like The Beatles in their prime — which is due primarily to the five years that Martin spent playing in a popular Beatles-clone band, The Grottybeats, before becoming a lawyer. Another selection, Goodbye Love, shows off the strong vocal talents of Marci, who runs an off-site word-processing company when she isn't pursuing an entertainment career. Rob, who works for Ontario s Privacy Commission, provides guitar, vocal harmonies, and lead vocals on the ballad Don't Want Your Love Anymore. (All these songs are original compositions of Martin Gladstone.)

It's really quite exciting being able to play music with a lifelong friend and seeing his music recorded, which was a dream of his since I've known him, says Rob, who has known Martin since the age of 12. Twins, Martin and Marci are brother and sister not only to each other but also to this writer and three other siblings, all residents of Toronto.

The album, in CD or cassette form, is available in music stores across Canada, or direct from Whale Records, 225 Richmond St. West, Suite 205, Toronto ON M5V 1W2. The Acoustics CD Release Party is set for Clinton's, 693 Bloor St. W., Toronto, on August 31 at 8.30 p.m.; a cover charge applies. For details, phone (416) 535-5541.

BUSMAN'S HONEYMOON

MP Simma Holt profiled

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Simma Holt, the first Jewish woman member of parliament, credits an Orthodox grandfather in Vegreville, Alberta, for her sense of social justice.

The 72-year-old journalist and author also reveals little-known details of a succession of suitors for her hand, in a CBC-TV program airing August 30 at 7 p.m.

The half-hour show Our Stories is one of 13 about ordinary Canadians who have an unusual story.

After Holt had joined The Vancouver Sun as a reporter, she said her mother, still living in Vegreville, sent a number of young men to date her.

"She was particularly pushing one fellow, but when he told her I made wonderful liver rolls by wrapping them in bacon, my mother lost interest in him," Holt said.

But she restored her mother's faith in her by marrying Leon Holt in a traditional Jewish wedding in 1949.

"We agreed that our careers would come first and we would have no children. The more notorious my career became, the more loyal Leon was. He died in 1985, and there isn't a day that I haven't missed him. In fact I'm still mad at him for dying when he did."

Holt said she was "unaware" of anti-Semitism when growing up in Vegreville, where her father, Louis, operated Milner's Trading Store.

It was her grandfather who generally set the tone in the household where no light switches were used on the Sabbath, advocating justice for all.

But in one instance, she recalls her father speaking out to a crowd in the street, defending the right of free speech for Jehovah's Witnesses.

Holt's stint in Ottawa as a Liberal MP (1974-79) left her feeling that "parliament is irrelevant, it's other people who run the country." But she made her mark as vice-chair of the justice committee.

Narrator Jane Glassco described Holt as "a crusader, reformer and feminist."

The TV show traces her 30-year reporting career in Vancouver, during which she saved three men from the gallows, travelled to Uruguay in 1963 to expose a Doukhobor sect causing violence in British Columbia, and authored Terror In the Name of God.

"She was a reporter who not only looked for stories, but also looked for solutions and often found them," narrator Glassco said.

As the only woman in the newsroom when she first joined The Sun, Holt had to fend off snide asides when she landed the waterfront and skid row beat.

Her interest in crime reporting was foreshadowed when, as a high school girl, she sat on the rail of the courthouse in Vegreville where a murder trial was unfolding and soaked up the details when participants emerged.

There was a continuing battle against sexism in the newsroom, and Holt had more than one run-in with a city editor who had photos of near-naked women plastered behind his desk.

One of eight children, Holt said it was her mother who convinced Milner pere that Simma should have a university education and she enrolled in the University of Manitoba in Winnipeg. A summer stint on the Winnipeg Free Press and a reporting job on The Calgary Herald followed; she joined The Vancouver Sun city desk in 1944 at $22 a week.

Holt said the most difficult time in her life came when she lost her husband, her mother, and her job on the Parole Board of Canada in quick succession.

She joked about her ability to agitate. "One of my school teachers said 'if you ever shut up, you'd suffocate.'"

And she vowed that her gravestone would contain only three words: "Silent at last."

BOOKS

By BERNARD BASKIN

Einstein Lived Here by Abraham Pais (Oxford University Press $32.95)

There is no argument, Albert Einstein who died in 1955 was the most esteemed physicist of the 20th century. His scientific accomplishments brought him world-wide acclaim and the Nobel Prize in 1921.

Some years ago Abraham Pais, a renowned physicist, wrote Subtle is the Lord, which focused on Einstein as a scientist and mathematician. His new book, more informal and accessible, is a kaleidoscopic portrait that probes Einstein's ideas on religion, philosophy, politics, Israel and Zionism, the menace of fascism — and much more. To document these diverse opinions the author makes use of newspaper and magazine archives from 1902 to the present.

Reared in a secular home, never having had a Bar Mitzvah and totally unobservant, Einstein's views on religion were understandably singular and non traditional. For him God was an impersonal force that manifested itself in nature.

He wrote, "A knowledge of the existence of something we cannot penetrate, our perceptions of the profoundest reason and the most radiant beauty, which only in their most primitive forms are accessible to our minds — it is this knowledge and this emotion that constitute true religiosity; in this sense, and in this alone, I am a deeply religious man."

This notion of a mystical, cosmic religious force offered no challenge to science. He concluded that "Science without religion is lame, religion without science is blind."

It was Chaim Weizmann who recruited Einstein to the Zionist cause and over the years he displayed unremitting interest in Jewish institutions in Palestine. In 1925 he wrote, "Zionism is on its way to create in Palestine a centre of Jewish spiritual life. For this one should forever be grateful to its leaders. The existence of this moral homeland will, I hope, successfully give a plus of vitality to a people that has not yet deserved to die out . . . I believe I can maintain that Zionism, an apparent nationalistic movement, has in final analysis significant merit for humanity at large."

This emphasis on the moral and spiritual values of Zionism was to remain Einstein's view for the rest of his life. Pais writes, "I am sure that he would have been disgusted with the later governments of Begin and Shamir had he lived to see their methods — and would have said so publicly."

Offered the presidency of Israel in 1952, he refused on the grounds of age and lack of the necessary qualifications.

When Hitler came to power Einstein promptly resigned from his research position in Berlin to settle permanently in the United States as an honored member of Princeton's prestigious Institute for Advanced Study.

Although a firm believer in pacifism, he decided that it was a fruitless tactic against fascist brutality and called for an alliance of anti-fascist forces, in order to resist Nazi aggression.

He was frequently credited — or blamed — for his role in suggesting the atomic bomb project to the United States and the subsequent development of atomic energy. He resisted this notion. "I do not consider myself the father of the release of atomic energy. My part in it was quite indirect. I did not, in fact, foresee that it would be released in my time. I believed only that it was theoretically possible." After the war he warned increasingly against the dangers of nuclear weapons and favored universal disarmament under the aegis of a world government.

At one point in his career, Einstein was moved to wonder, "Why is it that nobody understands me and everybody likes me?" This readable book will increase the number of those who will better understand him as a remarkable and many-sided human being.

Film targets the life of a 10-year-old boy

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

Jesper Salen in The Slingshot, now playing at the Carlton Cinema.

Ake Sandgren's film, The Slingshot, is a delightful romp into the life of a 10-year-old boy with an inquiring mind and an insouciant personality.

The boy, Roland Schutt (Jesper Salen), is constantly being defined by others. As a result, he begins to question himself.

In essence, Roland's problem revolves around religion and politics, an explosive mixture at any time and in any place. But in 1920s Stockholm, where The Slingshot is set, these factors seem to be especially important.

On his Russian-born mother's side, Roland is Jewish. So, naturally, he is the butt of anti-Semitic insults and insinuations.

From his Swedish father, Roland inherits his incipient Socialist beliefs. He is therefore twice cursed, Swedish society of the day viewing his father's red-hot politics as treasonous and his mother's religion as blasphemous.

To make matters worse, Roland is bullied by his older brother, Bertil (Niclas Olund), an amateur boxer who uses his nose as a punching bag. More often than not, Roland's much-maligned nose is bandaged, a conceit which viewers may find somewhat charming.

The Slingshot, which opened at the Carlton on July 29, begins on a wintry afternoon in a park. Roland's playmates dare him to lick a metal pole, and being a feisty kid, he responds to the challenge, albeit foolhardedly.

His tongue stuck to the pole, the kids taunt Roland. He's saved from a terrible fate when his mother, Zipa (Basia Frydman), comes along and saves him. Caustically, one of the boys refers to his "Jew nose" and his circumsized penis.

But, as Roland learns, more of the same lies ahead. At a political meeting he goes to with his father (Stellan Skarsgard), an attendant brushes him off as a "little Jew boy," prompting Roland to declare rather proudly that he is a Jew and a Socialist.

The worst, though, is yet to come. Roland's pompous teacher, Lundin (Ernst-Hugo Jaregard), scathingly dismisses Roland as an "anti-Christ," a "revolutionary," a "Jew," and a "criminal."

These diatribes are triggered in equal parts by Lundin's crass anti-Semitism and by his puritanical reaction to Roland's invention, a slingshot made of condoms.

The slingshot, in fact, is an apt metaphor insofar as Roland is concerned. For, like a slingshot, he always springs back from each setback, learning as he goes along.

Jesper Salen carries the movie with self-assurance and panache. He is a natural actor, with an animated face that the camera adores.

Fine performances are also turned in by Stellan Skarsgard, whose avuncular manner is quite appealing, and Basia Frydman, whose world-weary demeanor strikes an immediate chord of recognition.

The Slingshot — which was Sweden's entry as best foreign film at the 1993 Academy Awards — unfolds effortlessly and is never less than entertaining.

A preview of the Film Festival

TORONTO — The 1994 Toronto International Film Festival (formerly the Festival of Festivals) recently announced a partial line-up of films for its 19th year.

India is the focus of this year's national cinema program in India Now!, a survey of the very best of that country's current art, documentary and commercial film industries.

Festival goers can catch the North American premiere of the Indian film Bandit Queen, and five films by Tamil director Mani Rathnam: Bombay, Thief Thief, Roja, Nayakan, and A Silent Symphony.

The 1994 Directors' Spotlight program salutes the remarkable career of Nikita Milhalkov, one of Russia's greatest contemporary filmmakers. His latest, Burnt By The Sun, won the Special Jury Prize at the 1994 Cannes film festival.

Cuban filmmaker Tomas Gutierrez Alea will be the focus of a tribute culminating in the gala presentation of his new comedy, co-directed with Juan Carlos Tabio, Strawberry And Chocolate.

The 19th annual Toronto International Film Festival takes place Sept. 8 to 17.

Meet the Sesame Street characters at Sesame Place.

A family-oriented themed play park

LANGHORNE, Pa. — At Sesame Park, the family-oriented, Sesame Street themed play park near Philadelphia, there are over 52 (double the number of letters in the alphabet) activities and water rides that are fun for the whole family.

Besides the regular performances of the Big Bird & Company Musical Revue and other audience participation shows, there is a new and exciting Alphabet Parade filled with favorite Sesame Street characters, floats, an exciting new soundtrack and opportunities for children to join in the fun.

Children can enjoy Sesame Place's newest attraction, Twiddlebug Land, where adults and kids alike can feel like the tiny creatures that live in the flower-box outside Ernie and Bert's window on Sesame Street.

Different larger-than-life activities delight visitors — like the Mix-and-Match Twiddle Tracks, an unusual energy-saving railroad where youngsters use their arms to power gears that propel them down the track; Silly Sand Slides, where they can slide down a five-metre sand bucket and a giant tablespoon; and Teeny Tiny Tidal Waves, with a five-metre billboard of Ernie peering down on a half-metre-deep wave pool.

Fitness fun abounds in Big Bird's Court. There's Nets & Climbs, a Giant structure three stories high of cargo nets where children and parents build muscle strength while crawling through tunnels and climbing up hills of suspended netting. High energy is needed for jumping on Ernie's Bed Bounce, and Instant gratification is felt when youngsters climb to the top of Cookie Mountain.

Just as important as the fun and the educational enrichment at Sesame Place, is the value of building an interest in fitness with these Kid-powered activities.

Live stage performances are offered daily throughout the season. Musical shows are featured this season with two new productions created by Vee Corporation in conjunction with Children's Television Workshop. New shows include Bert & Ernie's Island Vacation, where memories of their tropical adventure are relived in a Caribbean setting. Oscar the Grouch, Jim Henson's popular Sesame Street character, also debuts in another new show called The Perils of Miss Prairie, where he plays the role of a villain who wants to turn the local ice cream parlor into the town dump. Playful exotic birds return to delight park visitors with their antics in the Birds of Paradise show.

Quite cute and eminently huggable are two more Sesame Street friends. Rosita, the turquoise-blue, furry and affectionate Latina monster will greet guests in Sesame Neighborhood. Telly Monster, too, will be there to supply children with furry hugs.

Undeniably, an incredible family adventure, Sesame Place offers a Variety of Wonderful experiences for Young and old alike who have a Zest for life!

Sesame Place is open April 30 through October 9 and operating days vary throughout the season. A single admission price of $20.95 (US) entitles visitors to all in-park activities. Guests 55 years and older pay $17.80, and children under two years are admitted free. A special late afternoon rate of $14.95 applies to tickets purchased three hours before closing. A 10 per cent discount applies when four or more passes are purchased by a family. There is a $4.00 charge for parking.

Sesame Place is located off PA Interstate 95 at the Route 1 North/Morrisville exit to Oxford Valley and is a 30-minute drive north of Philadelphia, 15 minutes southwest of Trenton, New Jersey, 90 minutes from New York City, and two-and-a-half hours from Baltimore and Washington, D.C.

Sesame Place, an Anheuser-Busch Theme Park, was developed in conjunction with Children's Television Workshop, a leading communications corporation and creator of the internationally acclaimed TV show Sesame Street.

TRAVEL TALK

By BILL GLADSTONE

Travel Guides for Canada: You'd think that a country as vast as Canada would be too large a subject to fit into the pages of a single travel guide. But Michelin's 244-page guide to Canada, which I have used on numerous trips from coast to coast, has been a worthy companion over the years. Its succinct, colorful phraseology, combined with its numerous spot maps and three-star rating system, has proven adequate to the task of summarizing the wide multitude of geographic and man-made wonders of which this nation is comprised.

However, I've recently discovered that a French tire manufacturer is not the only party capable of putting out a first-rate tourist guidebook of Canada. An American company that specializes in mass-market tourist guidebooks also does the trick superbly well. Frommer's Comprehensive Travel Guide to Canada, updated for 1994-95, is a well-organized, concise, highly readable capsule guide whose 800 pages contain all the important information a visitor needs in almost any place within our precious Dominion, from sea to sea to sea.

Unlike Michelin, the Frommer guide offers detailed information on hotels, restaurants, bars and the entertainment scene, including prices. As well, it offers many practical tips and Cool for Kids boxes. Its capsule history, which begins with the Vikings and ends astutely at the present moment with a section called Union or Separation?, compares favorably with Michelin.

Its opening sentence on Toronto demonstrates how well the guide's three writers have captured flavor, atmosphere and history: Once lampooned as dull and ugly, a city whose inhabitants fled to Buffalo for a good time and where the blinds were drawn on Sunday at the main department store (Eaton's) to stop anyone from sinfully window-shopping, Toronto, now with a population of over three million, has burst forth from its stodgy past during the last decade, and grabbed attention as one of the most exciting cities on the North American continent.

Not lightweight by any means, and a great deal of fun besides, Frommer's Comprehensive Travel Guide for Canada 94-95 is available in bookstores for $24.50.

Funerary stelae

Sinai Treasures: Visitors have been flocking to the Israel Museum in Jerusalem for one last look at some of the ancient treasures that Israeli archaeologists dug up in the Sinai desert when it was under Israel's control in the '70s. These items, some of which date back 5,000 years and more, would almost certainly still be covered with sand if not for Israeli diggers. Still, when Egypt claimed ownership of the artifacts, Israel agreed to return the collection, and has lived up to its word.

Many items have already been transferred to Cairo. But some prized remaining items, including oil lamps, burial masks, urns, funerary stelae, arrowheads and necklaces, were recently taken from museum storage and put on public display. The exhibition, Sinai: A Farewell for Peace closes on Sept. 12, and the remaining artifacts are due to be in Egyptian hands by December.

"This is the first time I know of in the 20th century that, as the result of a political agreement between two countries, cultural property is being returned," says museum director Martin Weyl.

Lenin's residence

Kolel Israel Study Tour: A tour geared for those who want to experience Israel with a Bible in their hands is offered by Kolel: A Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, in conjunction with Ayelet Tours, Inc. Dates are March 12 to 23, 1995, and cost is $2,350 per person.

The tour, which is based in Jerusalem, focuses on biblical sites. It allows participants to study at four Israeli institutions that are counterparts to Kolel. Each day's lesson deals with actual textual references to the next day's journey. Rabbi Elyse Goldstein expects to be in attendance.

The tour includes round trip air via New York, seven nights in Jerusalem's Windmill Hotel, one night in Kibbutz Nof Ginossar (Galilee), one night in the Grand Beach Hotel (Tel Aviv), various meals, and all touring, classes, lectures and sightseeing. Kolel, (905) 709-1900.

Van Gogh Museum, Amsterdam: An unusual exhibition of self-portraits by Vincent Van Gogh is on view at Amsterdam's Van Gogh Museum thru Oct. 9. Twenty of the canvases, painted in Paris between 1886 and 1887, are on display for the first time. Five, rarely displayed, were painted on both sides of the canvas. Thanks to new frames, both sides are open to viewing simultaneously.

Switzerland Steamships: The Lake Geneva Steamship Company offers a new two-hour Folklore and Dinner Cruise, daily thru Sept. 30. The two-hour Castle Cruise leaves Geneva for the old private harbor of the Rothschild family estate, then continues to the 12th-century Castle Bellerive, and the romantic Villa Diodati where Lord Byron stayed in 1816. En route, the steamship passes a chalet that was Lenin's residence in 1914 when he planned the Russian Revolution.

Yuk Yuk's Mark Breslin

Mark Breslin, the man who brought stand-up comedy to Canada, knows how to make people laugh.

Breslin began Yuk Yuk's in 1976 to give aspiring Toronto comics a place to perform. From a one-night-a-week experiment in a converted church basement, Yuk Yuk's International has grown into the largest chain of comedy clubs in the world.

He has hosted his own two-hour radio talk show on Q107 and CFRB, produced The Late Show for the Fox Television Network, acted as comedy producer for The Joan Rivers Show and was executive producer of Friday Night with Ralph Benmurgui, the Canadian variety show scrapped last year because of poor ratings. Breslin is currently artistic director of the Toronto People's Comedy Festival.

Breslin talked to The CJN's Carolyn Blackman in his Bay Street office.

CJN: What role did you play in bringing comedy to Canada?

Breslin: There was always comedy in Canada but there was not the kind of comedy we are doing [when I started]. Back then the only kind of live comedy performance was sketch comedy as practiced by people like Second City, rural humor by people such as Dave Broadfoot, Don Heron or the Royal Canadian Air Force, and dinner theatre such as Spring Thaw.

We came from a totally different kind of generation — Canadians raised on American television, watching American stand-up [and saying they could do stand-up too]. What I did was get that generation of people to do it.

CJN: Do you have a major competitor?

Breslin: There are other comedy clubs in many of the cities we operate in but we really think the major competitor in this life is apathy. The real difficult thing is [getting] people to get out of their houses when it has become so convenient to turn on the television and see whatever they want. It is becoming more and more difficult to motivate people to come out of the house, get in the car, pay a babysitter, find parking and brave the unsafe streets. That is what we see as our major competitor. We have to market harder and harder each year.

CJN: What is the update on the clubs?

Breslin: We open and close clubs like shoe stores. When there is a hot area, we open one up and then if it is supposed to become a cold area we close it down. It ranges in any year from 12 to 18 clubs depending on circumstances. We just opened one up in Windsor and we closed the one in [Toronto's] Yorkville because Yorkville is no longer a happening place.

CJN: Did you always want to become a comedian?

Breslin: No. I wound up on stage by accident because I was the cheapest emcee I could find. I would rather pay myself than somebody else.

I had all kinds of ambitions but in the '60s I became involved in a kind of counter-cultural perspective on things and I knew I didn't want a straight job. I was a good student. I could have become a lawyer and I was accepted into a master's program but none of that interested me. I wanted to do something that was much more subversive and challenging so when comedy fell into my lap, I chose it.

I was part of the first team hired to develop Harbourfront in 1974. As a programmer I met comics and although I loved all the acts that we would bring in, it was the comics that affected me because they epitomized the kind of existentialist, anti-hero loner that I see myself as being. Basically [comics] are misfits and I see myself as very much a misfit in this society.

CJN: Are comics always comics, even offstage?

Breslin: The truth is that comics are most often depressives and that is probably one of the reasons they become comics. They are basically very serious people who cannot handle the seriousness of life so they invent another self which is a funny self and that funny self is like coming up for oxygen.

If you dig deep you probably find that most comics have a kind of personal tragedy that goes way back. Generally speaking, they are trying to overcome feelings of inadequacy and worthlessness passed on by their parents. They could be fat, short, tall, gay, black or Jewish — they've got something going on that makes them feel not particularly well. That is why they have developed this way of communicating with people.

CJN: Is there a particular stream of Jewish comedy?

Breslin: Ten years ago I would have said absolutely, but the Jewish community has become so homogenized and assimilated over the past decade or two that it is very difficult to identify specific Jewish humor.

Only a generation ago I would have said that people like Lenny Bruce, Robert Klein, David Steinberg and a lot of other people represented a kind of humanism that is very much within the tradition of Jewish cultures. There's not much of a leap from Phillip Roth and Saul Bellow to Robert Klein and David Steinberg. I do not see that so much now.

As a matter of fact, fewer and fewer Jewish kids are coming up on our amateur nights saying they want to become comics. When I started, 80 per cent of the talent was Jewish. I think they have become suburbanized and the drive to express themselves in what is perceived a hostile, gentile society no longer exists.

I lament this because Jews have always contributed way beyond their numbers in comedy, probably because comedy is always about sad beauty. There is a sadness underneath the laughter. There is something hurting and that's what makes it valuable. That's why Jews are so close to that feeling. Now it's just not true because we do not hurt enough.

Jewish comics aren't talking about what I would consider to be traditional Jewish themes. The social action component seems to be missing now. These kids are so far from any ethnic groups that in most cases they don't even have grandparents who remember what it was like then. I think that is one reason Jackie Mason has done so well as a kind of nostalgia act. So many Jewish people are hungry for that kind of world. Where do you find Yiddishkeit anymore?

CJN: Is the Canadian comedy industry thriving?

Breslin: I do lectures in which I explain to people that Canadians are represented in the world market in comedy disproportionate to their numbers.

It is very interesting, the number of comedy institutions in the United States that are actually controlled by Canadians. Half the writers on Roseanne are Canadians and Saturday Night Live is basically a Canadian invention by Lorne Michaels.

If you want to make $1 million a year or more you cannot stay in this country. You can't blame people for leaving when fame and fortune beckons. What Yuk Yuk's has been able to do is offer people a middle class living while they are in this country but nobody really gets into this business to make a middle class living. They want to gamble for all or nothing and that is why ultimately people do go to the United States.

CJN: Do you feel abandoned when people leave?

Breslin: I never feel badly when people leave me for something better. If they leave for something worse I feel bad. As long as they are bettering themselves though, I don't feel resentful because there are so many other guys coming up that we have to have people leave or there won't be room.

CJN: What is Yuk Yuk's annual revenue?

Breslin: Yuk Yuk's clubs bring in $12 million annually.

CJN: Do you have clubs in Montreal?

Breslin: We had one decades ago but we would never presume to program bilingualism, so we got out of that market.

CJN: What big names started out at Yuk Yuk's?

Breslin: Howie Mandel and Jim Carrey, who at this moment is probably the hottest comedian on the planet, started right here on amateur night. We gave Carrey the hook the first three times he was on. That is how bad he was. He jokes about that now. Comedians such as Mike McDonald and Larry Horowitz also started here, and Rick Moranis started here before he went into sketch comedy. A lot of very talented people started at Yuk Yuk's.

CJN: Do you have a favorite comedian?

Breslin: I have a lot of favorite comedians, a pantheon of people I love and resect. Going back over time, I guess Chaplin, Jackie Gleason, Jack Benny, Lenny Bruce and Mort Sahl. My favorite modern comedians could be Joan Rivers or Mike MacDonald.

Firm supplies labels for fashion houses

By SIMON GRIVER
Special to The CJN

KARMIEL — Those ever-present labels on clothes which tell the size, fabric and washing instructions do not seem like the stuff of which fortunes are made.

Moshe Belzer, a resident of Karmiel in the western Galilee, thought otherwise.

Last year, Belzer, a 44-year-old entrepreneur, established his own company to design, manufacture and market labels to leading clothing manufacturers in North America and Western Europe, including The Gap and Marks and Spencer.

His Bet Hatavit (House of the Label) employs six people, including a new immigrant graphic artist.

"I could not have achieved this on my own without Maof," confesses Belzer. "I had good ideas and lots of energy but absolutely no previous entrepreneurial experience."

Belzer's Bet Hatavit is one of 140 businesses supported by the Maof Entrepreneurial Encouragement Centre in the western Galilee city of Karmiel. Set up in 1991 by the Jewish Agency with funding from the UJA/Federation Annual Campaign, Maof helps new enterprises receive Jewish Agency guaranteed loans.

Maof also provides rent-subsidized workshops and office equipment such as fax and photocopying machines.

Moshe Belzer, owner of Bet HaTavit.

The Maof centre is part of a larger nationwide network of business and hi-tech incubators funded by the Jewish Agency through Operation Opportunity. The program creates employment opportunities for new immigrants. Maof is also funded through the Jewish Agency by the Jewish Federation of Greater Philadelphia, Israeli government ministries, the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee and the Karmiel Municipality.

"We rigorously scrutinize proposals for new business and the ways in which budding entrepreneurs intend to put their ideas into practice," says Maof director Moshe Armon. "That's why we have seen the success of 140 businesses that we've backed. They employ more than 500 people of whom more than 40 per cent are new immigrants from the former Soviet Union."

Maof allows new companies to spend a maximum of two years at the centre's modern premises, after which they must make way for newer entrepreneurs.

Maof's premises were designed by Gabi Magen, 47, an architect from nearby Moshav Yuvalim. "The business world is a jungle," he says. "Being in a business incubator such as Maof saves us from being devoured."

Entrepreneurs like label-maker Belzer agree. "I used to be a taxi driver," says label-maker Belzer. "I worked in a factory that made labels. But the owner lacked initiative and ambition. He sold to the local market and told me I was a fool when I suggested he look for export outlets."

Obviously not.

British Firm Wants To Buy Bezek Shares

JERUSALEM — The British telecommunications company Cable and Wireless has expressed interest in buying Bezek shares.

The chair of the company, Lord Young, met with Bezek director-general Yitzhak Kaul in London to discuss the proposal. The British firm is also willing to sell some of its stock to Bezek.

Kaul said the proposal must be brought before the government, as it owns majority control of Bezek. After the next issue, the government's share in the company will drop to 51 per cent.

Over the past year, Cable and Wireless has been conducting experiments on "TV by demand" — in which subscribers can select movies that are beamed into their TV via a regular phone cable. If the two companies cooperate, this service may be one of those on which they work together, Kaul said.

Kaul also met with the chairman of the board of British Telecom to discuss options for Israel's joining a major bloc in world telecommunications.

$1 Million Investment

JERUSALEM — Darcom, the private telecommunications company, will invest $1 million during the next three months on developing and expanding its international communications network in Israel, Europe and the northern United States.

Darcom chair David Reichmann said the investment in infrastructure results from demand "way beyond our expectations" for overseas calls via Darcom's network.

The number of calls increases by 25 per cent each month, he said. The company, founded two years ago, offers videoconferencing, data transmission, overseas faxes and calls, voice mail and connections to Internet.

Firms Cement Deal In China

JERUSALEM — Several local metal companies have signed contracts with Chinese firms, said the chair of the Manufacturers Association's metal and electricity division.

Zvi Plada is currently heading a delegation of industrialists to China, Burma and Vietnam to collect information for assisting Israeli companies doing business there.

In China, the delegation's representatives signed a number of know-how and joint industrial cooperation agreements.

Zika Electrode Works general manager Israel Shotland has signed a joint research agreement in the aluminum welding field for the Chinese aviation industry.

Gamma Aluminum, which is managed by Plada, has signed an agreement in principle with the Shantung province to establish a joint plant near the Korean border.

Tadiran Electrical Appliances Industries general manager Moshe Erez is reportedly interested in selling refrigerators, air conditioners and other products in China, Burma and Vietnam.

The association said Deutsch Dagen, the manufacturer of electrical and fiber-optic connectors, is about to sign an agreement with a company based in Shanghai.

Hish Processing and Conveying Technology is also examining the possibility of signing joint partnership agreements with Chinese firms.

Corporate Credit Cards

JERUSALEM — American Express plans to offer corporate credit cards to leading companies and ministries in Israel, said Michael Stolowitzky, director international business development of American Express Travel Related Services Company.

Stolowitzky has arrived in Israel for a seven-week visit to assist American Express's local efforts to expand its business here. American Express plans to offer credit cards to large local businesses and also plans to encourage tourists to visit the country by offering them attractive packages.

The credit card company has already published a colorful travel brochure of Israel, Egypt and Turkey. The brochure will be distributed at American Express's 850 branches in the United States and also in its offices in England and Germany.

The director said American Express plans to start promoting its corporate credit cards by sending letters to leading businessmen. The cards offer access to the company's network of free services, including travel arrangements and hotel accommodation worldwide.

CPI Jumps By 1.4 Per Cent

JERUSALEM — The Consumer Price Index (CPI) jumped 1.4 per cent in June, as an expected moderation in housing prices did not materialize and fruit prices soared due to a poor harvest this summer.

Rahamim Ozama, head of the Central Bureau of Statistics' price division, estimated that inflation is now running at 14.5 per cent annually, based on the past half year.

Treasury officials were caught by surprise, expecting housing prices to moderate. Treasury internal estimates predicted that prices would only rise half a percentage point last month.

The Bank of Israel defended its anti-inflationary policies in the wake of June's high CPI.

Strategic Plan To Target Deficit

JERUSALEM — Finance Minister Avraham Shohat and Bank of Israel Governor Jacob Frenkel met recently to discuss the framework for next year's budget.

Both sides declared a wide area of agreement on budgetary goals and on the budget's general framework that is needed to continue economic growth and lower inflation.

Shohat and Frenkel said a smaller budget deficit is required to guarantee growth and keep prices under control, but it is not clear if they agreed on a specific reduction.

Budget Director David Brodet has said recently that the deficit will be cut by more than a tenth of a percent under this year's deficit of three per cent of GDP.

Both sides agreed that taxes have to be cut, especially since the tax burden is expected to rise when the health tax and the union tax are imposed with the implementation of the National Health Insurance law.

Frenkel called for tax cuts to encourage production and employment and keep prices under control. His statement implies Frenkel is pushing for tax cuts for employers, rather than lowering Value Added Taxes or purchase taxes, which would encourage greater consumption and increase the pressure on prices.

Frenkel emphasized the importance of continuing the policy of opening the local market to imports and of increasing competition, since these reforms help lower prices.

Elscint Sells To Elbit

JERUSALEM — Elscint is leaving the ultrasound arena, combining all products into a package to be sold to Elbit.

Elbit announced its acquisition of California-based ultrasound concern Diasonics. Elscint corporate secretary Chaim Ben-Dayan stated that the company welcomed the purchase, which complemented Elbit's holdings and strengthened its position in the world artificial imaging market.

It was further stated that Elscint would assist Elbit in the successful absorption of the ultrasound line by merging all holdings in subsidiary Elscintech together with the newly acquired company. The ultrasound division will be sold along with a transfer of manpower, knowhow and R&D.

First Delivery in $22 Million Deal

JERUSALEM — TAAS-Israel Industries held a festive ceremony in Jerusalem to mark their supplying of the first 50 Tactical Air Launched Decoys (TALD) to the U.S. Navy.

Officials of the U.S. Navy, McDonnell Douglas, the Lockheed Corporation, the American Embassy and members of the Knesset finance committee participated in the event at TAAS's Netz plant.

The $22 million deal for the supply of 1,500 TALDs is to be completed by October, 1995.

Under the contract, TAAS is obligated to supply 100 TALDs a month. TAAS's TALD system confuses enemy anti-aircraft, allowing aircraft to reach their objectives while significantly reducing or eliminating loss of life and aircraft.

Despite plans to close the Netz plant, the factory received a $4.5 million order from McDonnell Douglas for the production of an item which is exclusively made by the Jerusalem plant.

Israel's godfather on Wall Street

By ALLISON KAPLAN SOMMER
Special to The CJN

ISRAEL — One might have thought that Harvey Krueger had seen and done it all when it came to managing investments in Israel.

But the senior managing director with Lehman Brothers — and the closest thing Israeli business has to a godfather on Wall Street — has found a new vehicle with which to usher in the era of the peace economy.

Krueger has taken a leadership role in a partnership in a fund which will privately place investments in Israeli companies. The Renaissance Fund was formed by Claridge Israel Inc., the Bronfmans' Israeli vehicle, and Stockton Partners, an investment company that Krueger heads.

The Renaissance Fund, which has raised $157 million — $137 million from abroad and $20 million from within Israel — thinks big.

"We will not do deals smaller than $5 million, and we will commit a maximum of 20 per cent of the fund [$30 million] to each deal," says Krueger.

The fund will, however, be capable of handling deals of more than $30 million, since the individual partners will have the opportunity to co-invest in projects with Renaissance.

The main requirement is size. Specifically, Krueger and his partners are eyeing a substantial stake in Bank Hapoalim. They are also aiming at large established firms about to be or in the process of being privatized, such as Bezek, Israel Chemicals and Shekem.

Why think so big?

"We're all such lazy people!" Krueger jokes. "You know, it's easier to do five deals for $30 million apiece, than 30 deals for $5 million apiece."

It is a rare light-hearted moment for Krueger, who is the picture of the serious Wall Street figure. He is all business when discussing the current markets and the role of Renaissance.

But his eyes light up when he is sidetracked into discussing his primary volunteer activity in Israel, working for the Hebrew University, of which he is a former chairman of the board of governors.

It began in 1961, when he took Bank Leumi public in what, at the time, was "a modest offering in American terms." A year later he did the same thing for Israel Discount Bank.

It was a time when the Arab boycott was taken seriously on Wall Street. The firm Krueger was associated with at the time, Kuhn, Loeb & Co. (which later merged with Lehman Brothers), was the only American firm willing to do business with Israel.

Even as Israel's international image grew stronger, local firms were still not considered hot commodities in the investment world.

"It was interesting that during the strong political period of 1967-73, Israel was not viewed as much of an economic success story," Krueger observes. "It wasn't viewed as a place to invest in, and things were relatively dormant."

In the mid-1970s, Krueger handled the financing of the Hadera power plant. In 1987 the new era of Israel on Wall Street was ushered in. Krueger handled public offerings for Elbit and Teva.

As the intifadah took hold, it was definitely a challenge to rally interest in Israeli securities; sales were almost exclusively retail at first, as there was little interest from institutional investors.

Today, both the number of companies going public in New York and the size of the companies has grown. Krueger has handled 17 offerings of Israeli companies of $25 million or more.

One lesson Krueger learned early was that he couldn't count on big Jewish philanthropists as ready customers for Israeli stocks.

"There has definitely been a mindset among many that Israel is a place to give money to, not to invest in."

Though he refuses to name names, Krueger says the formation of Renaissance changes that, because it includes Jewish investors who, until now, have seen Israel strictly as a recipient of philanthropy.

The prospect of peace between Israel and its neighbors seems to have changed their minds, and the minds of other investors. The targeted amount for the Renaissance Fund had been $100 million, but they got together $157 million.

The idea for forming Renaissance evolved at a lunch with Jonathan Kolber, who has been president and chief executive officer of Claridge Israel since 1989 and also serves as chairman of the board of directors of Renaissance.

Business and government leaders have long consulted with Krueger.

As during previous visits to Israel, he doesn't mince his words. He warns the government that it must carefully time the launching onto the capital markets of companies like El Al, Bezek and Israel Chemicals, in order to maximize the returns.

Opportunities have already been missed, he says. El Al should have been put on the block several years ago when the value of airlines was at an all-time high.

To the Israeli companies traded on the exchanges in New York, Krueger sends a strong message to keep their investors better informed and up-to-date, so they are not surprised by price fluctuations.

While these developments may be of concern to Krueger in his role at Lehman Brothers, it actually works in the favor of a private placement group like Renaissance, which offers companies an alternative source of capital to the stock markets.

"People who were going public at a crazy price are now willing to talk to us," Krueger says.

"We believe that as the stock market is becoming sober, we can buy things at reasonable prices," adds Kolber, sitting beside Krueger.

In any case, Krueger says Israeli stocks will stabilize. Despite the current gyrations, "it is our experience that people understand that Israel, in the long run, is a good place to invest in," Krueger says. "You can make money here."

ENHANCING ECONOMIC TIES

Bank Hapoalim is involved in enhancing Israel's economic ties and in helping absorb waves of new immigrants, said Ehud Arnon, manager of Foreign Trade. Arnon (left) spoke recently at the World Conference of Jewish Communcal Service (WCJCS). At the right of Arnon is the Honorable Abba Eban who was the keynote speaker at the closing plenary session. Hapoalim was among the conference's sponsors.

This week The CJN features . . . Israel Discount Bank

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN

TORONTO — the Israel Discount Bank of Canada has strong ties with the Jewish Community — 60 per cent of its customers are Jewish — but you won't find it near Bathurst Street.

Located at Avenue Road and Cumberland Avenue, the elegantly appointed bank with its dark mahogany and white marble interior, blends into the chic surroundings of Yorkville. And the name Discount is something of an anomaly in this neighborhood.

Amos Tuval, the CEO of the Israel Discount Bank of Canada told The CJN the name was appropriate when the bank was founded in 1935, because it discounted promissory notes, but today it no longer applies. In Israel, the bank is no different than any of the other large Israeli banks, he said.

The Israel Discount Bank of Canada operates as a fully chartered Canadian bank, and is a member of the Canadian Deposit Insurance Corporation. It was established here 12 years ago, a year after the government passed legislation to allow foreign banks into Canada.

"We offer a boutique service," he said. "It's very personal. This is why people keep coming to us. You talk to the same credit officer as you did 10 years ago. You know him. He knows your family and your children. You feel more comfortable with him."

The bank has deliberately set up this type of service in Canada, Tuval said, because it cannot compete with the "supermarket" of the large major Canadian banks, with their wide range of customer services.

The specialty product offered by the Israel Discount Bank is an expertise in international banking; the staff are very skilled in expediting letters of credit for international trade, Tuval said.

He explained that it takes a large Canadian bank an average of three to five working days to set up a letter of credit, while officers at his bank can get the job done in one day. "The big difference is this is our niche," he said.

The Israel Discount Bank of Canada has focused on the financial paperwork associated with international trade, because its main agenda is to promote trade between Canada and Israel, Tuval said.

He insists that making a profit is a secondary goal. "With the same capital we can make more money in Israel. It's our own turf."

The bank, as a member of the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce, also finds Canadian customers or investors for Israeli products, and vice versa, Tuval said.

With its focus on business and trade the Israel Discount Bank does not cater to small accounts. The minimum loan is $100,000 and it offers term deposits from $10,000 and up. The rates are competitive for both Canadian and U.S. dollars. There is no RRSP service at this time.

There are commercial checking accounts, but the bank discourages personal ones because it doesn't have the manpower for this level of banking and it cannot duplicate the services offered at the major banks, such as the instant cash machines, Tuval said.

The bank is interested in attracting Jewish clientele, but there are no plans in the immediate future to open a bank closer to the Jewish community, he said. And, he added, with today's technology the location of the bank is not that important.

The cost of increasing the bank's profits in the Jewish community, may outweigh the benefit, Tuval said.

He admitted to being cautious but said his caution reflects the conservative philosophy of the Israel Discount Bank outside of Israel. The bank finances relatively safe ventures, he said. "We knowingly give up profits for security. In the long run we do better."

He said the bank did not make a huge profit during boom years of the '80s, but it has continued to be profitable in these leaner times. It doesn't regularly finance real estate; nor does it offer mortgages, which were areas of loss for many banks during the recession, Tuval said.

"We're here to stay for the long haul, not to make a quick profit."

Converting Military Industries

JERUSALEM — The country has to convert military industries into commercial enterprises to achieve a healthy economy, said Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.

He stressed that the effects of the massive worldwide reduction in defence spending are being felt everywhere, with the continuing threat to tens of thousands of jobs.

Rabin called on the Technion board of governors to ensure the group plays a leading role in finding innovative ways to move military industries into commercial areas, and help grasp the opportunities presented by the peace process and the general openness in world markets.

United Jewish Appeal Tribute Cards

A meaningful way to send greetings and acknowledgements all year round!

"Pray for the Peace of Jerusalem"

PERFECT FOR ROSH HASHANAH GREETINGS

Jewish holidays and other significant occasions are marked by the tradition of sending acknowledgements to family and friends. Make those greetings even more meaningful by sending them a United Jewish Appeal Tribute Card. Recipients will be informed that a donation has been made in their honour. Proceeds will assist in the resettlement of Jews from the former Soviet Union, war-torn eastern Europe and Ethiopia.

UJA is proud to present a choice of three unique card designs, "Pray for the Peace of Jerusalem" by Stephen Klein, "Sundown at the Western Wall" by Meyer F. Lieberman, and "The Timeless Spirit of Exodus" by Israeli artist Bracha Lavee. We hope you'll agree that each design offers a fresh, vibrant portrayal of a significant aspect of our Jewish heritage.

Weekend of violence

TEL AVIV — Two Israeli soldiers were killed last weekend in an attack by Hezbollah fighters in southern Lebanon.

Hezbollah also launched a series of rocket attacks on IDF units and the allied South Lebanon Army inside the security zone and on civilian targets in the Galilee, leaving three Israeli children slightly injured.

Hezbollah said the attacks were in retaliation for the Aug. 4 Israeli air strike on the Lebanese village of Deir Zahrani, which reportedly left seven civilians dead and 17 wounded.

Israel issued a highly unusual apology for the attack, saying the missiles mistakenly hit the village during a series of separate strikes on terrorist positions in southern Lebanon.

Israel lodges official complaint

Canada's acceptance of Israeli refugees provokes angry diplomatic response

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The flap between Israel and Canada over the granting of refugee status by Canada to Israeli citizens has provoked a flurry of activity among diplomats and politicians in both countries.

"It is an insult to one democracy that another democracy should accept its citizens as refugees," Itzhak Shelef, Israel's ambassador to Canada, said on CBC-TV August 4.

And in Israel, the Foreign Ministry lodged an official complaint with Canadian ambassador Norman Spector. [See story on page 10.]

The refugee claimants, who were granted Israeli citizenship under that country's Law of Return because of their Jewish background or their Jewish spouses, allege Israeli police failed to protect them from abuse, beatings, telephone threats and rape.

Canada has granted refugee status to about 300 claimants from Israel since 1992, almost all of them from the former Soviet Union.

Immigration Minister Sergio Marchi has said he will instruct the Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) to check more closely into claims made about persecution in Israel. "I am very sensitive to the fact that if anyone knows what a true refugee is, it is the Jewish people," he said last week.

About 2,000 Israelis are in Canada seeking refugee status and collecting welfare while they wait. Another 1,200 claims have been dismissed.

"They [refugee claimants] have taken money from Israel, a year of free accommodation and a year of free study and now they are collecting benefits in Canada, abusing the goodwill of both countries," Oren David, director of the Canadian desk in Israel's Foreign Ministry, told the CBC program As It Happens from Jerusalem.

Canada is the only country in the world to accept Israeli citizens as refugees, Eli Yerushalmi, a consular official at the Israel Embassy in Ottawa, told The CJN.

Yerushalmi said his staff will submit evidence to the IRB that Israeli citizens enjoy full civil rights.

"People who come from the Soviet Union used our system for a year, the money we provided, getting used to Western ways, then they come to Canada and say, 'I'm a Christian married to a Jew and I want you to accept me.' They have learned through lawyers that Canada has an opening in their refugee laws, a loophole they can come through," Yerushalmi said.

Gerry Stobo, the IRB's top legal counsel, said Canada uses the United Nations' definition of refugees as those fearing legitimate persecution in their home countries. In cases where people can show they fear persecution, he said, refugee status is granted no matter where they come from. from.

Itzhak Shelef

Sergio Marchi

Norman Spector

"We can't accept that there are refugees from Israel," said Chaim Waxman, Israel's vice consul in Toronto. "Israel isn't a refugee producing country. The claims are absurd and groundless."

Others, like the Canadian Council for Refugees, have said Canada is not going far enough in demanding proof of state-sanctioned persecution in Israel.

In one case, Montreal adjudicators granted refugee status to a family of three, even though there were doubts about the father's claim that he was forced to serve in the territories as part of compulsory military service.

Council president David Matas has said the problems facing Israeli citizens from the former Soviet Union — unemployment, housing shortages and cultural alienation — are not bases for refugee claims. "You could hardly consider that persecution."

Matas has also pointed to the high ratio of acceptance in Quebec as proof that Israel's democratic image may not be consistent across the country. IRB statistics show that one in every three Israeli claims heard in Quebec last year was accepted, while one in 12 Ontario claims was successful.

The IRB numbers show:

- Quebec adjudicators accepted 108 refugee claims last year and rejected 203. Another 38 were withdrawn.
- Ontario adjudicators last year accepted 44 claims and rejected 508. Another 261 were withdrawn.
- Five of 27 were accepted in the rest of the country.

IRB to re-evaluate policy on Israeli refugees

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — Canada's controversial policy of granting refugee status to Israeli citizens will be examined and re-evaluated at a special session of the Immigration and Refugee Board to be held in Montreal later this month.

On August 19 the Board is to hold the special hearing to examine and re-evaluate its Israeli refugee policy, according to human rights lawyer Irwin Cotler, one of three expert witnesses who was asked to testify at the session.

The three experts who will testify include: Cotler, who will review international criteria for granting refugee status; Natan Sharansky, head of the Zionist Forum, the main lobby group in Israel for immigrants from the former Soviet Union; and Lynda Brayer, the Jerusalem lawyer who supplies the Israeli applicants with documentation to support their claims of discrimination.

Brayer, a South African-born Jew who immigrated to Israel and then converted to Roman Catholicism, works as a lawyer for the Society of St. Ives, a legal resource centre active in defending Palestinian rights under the auspices of the Latin Patriarchate of Jerusalem. She provides applicants with an affidavit stating that Israel "is not a democratic state for a heterogenous population," that it discriminates against non-Jews in a de facto manner, depriving them of many civil rights, including ownership of land, public education, employment and health benefits. The affidavit also states that Israel pursues a systemic policy of "aggression, brutality and even murderous assault against Palestinians" — something which, the document implies, sheds light on Israel's overall treatment of non-Jews.

These claims suggest that any discrimination experienced by non-Jewish immigrants in Israel is part of a pattern of state-sanctioned persecution — the main criterion for conferring refugee status according to international law, says Cotler.

Allegations of state-sanctioned persecution are also reinforced by other documentation supplied to the Refugee Board, including excerpts from the Journal of Palestine Studies, reports from Israeli human rights groups and even statements made by Israeli leaders that appeared in Israel's Russian-language press.

In one such article, published three years ago, Meretz leader (and current minister of culture) Shulamit Aloni called Israel "a racist state."

Solidarity rally held in Toronto for Jewish victims of terror

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A veritable who's who of federal, provincial and municipal politics joined over 800 members of Toronto's Jewish community last week at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue for a service for the victims of recent terrorist attacks directed at Jewish and Israeli targets.

Strong messages of solidarity and condemnation of the Buenos Aires, London and Panama attacks came from federal Treasury Board president Art Eggleton; Ontario Citizenship Minister Elaine Ziemba; Toronto Mayor June Rowlands; Argentina's ambassador to Canada, Lillian O'Connell de Alurralde; and Israel's consul general, Dror Zeigerman, among others.

Canadians were "shocked and appalled" by the July 18 bombing of the Jewish community centre in Buenos Aires, which claimed an estimated 100 lives, said Eggleton, adding that Foreign Minister Andre Ouellet was quick to condemn the incident.

He said Canada "expects" Argentina, Great Britain and Panama to "act quickly" and apprehend those responsible for the terrorist attacks.

Last month's car bombing in Buenos Aires was followed in short order by the explosion of a plane killing 12 members of Panama's tiny Jewish community and by the bombings of the Israeli Embassy and a Jewish fundraising organization in London, injuring at least 19 people.

The world seems to expect more of Israel than it does of other nations when it comes to negotiating peace, Eggleton stated.

Argentina "has been hit hard, and we feel the pain," remarked a sombre O'Connell de Alurralde. "This is a time to mourn, but also a time to take action."

She called the Buenos Aires bombers "ruthless terrorists."

Argentina's embassy in Ottawa is willing to provide callers with updates on the investigation, she said.

In his remarks, Britain's acting consul general, Noel Guina, said the recent bomb attacks are attempts to undermine the peace process. "But instead, they only serve to draw [Jews] together and heighten Jewish solidarity" he said. The attacks "are proof that the peace process is working. Far from impeding it, they will accelerate it."

Ziemba read a message of support and solidarity from Ontario Premier Bob Rae, while Rowlands too offered words of comfort.

To applause, Zeigerman acknowledged the presence of Rashad Saleh, head of Palestine House in Toronto, and he thanked Saleh for having participated in a recent meeting Zeigerman held with Ziad Malawi, editor of Al-Mersal, a Canadian-Arab newspaper.

Iran, widely rumored to have been involved in the Buenos Aires and London attacks, "is a danger to the free world," Zeigerman said.

Similar attacks can easily take place in Canada, he warned.

Israel "will do everything in its power to stamp out terror."

Canadian Zionist Federation national president Kurt Rothschild read messages of support and condolences from the National Congress of Italian-Canadians and the Anglican Diocese of Toronto, and one from the Argentinian Zionist organization, thanking Canada for its support.

In his keynote address, Shaarei Shomayim Rabbi Mark Dratch warned against Jewish complacency.

"An attack on Jews anywhere is an attack on Jews everywhere. We have learned the lessons of silence too many times," he said.

"Silence is deadly. We have no choice but to get involved."

Jews are obliged — indeed, they have "a specific responsibility" — to visit Israel "and not be scared off" in times of tension.

Cantor Martin Steinhouse sang O Canada and Hatikvah and chanted the K'el Malei Rahamim.

A prayer for the State of Israel was delivered by Andrea Silverstone, national chair of the Jewish Students' Network.

Also on hand at the service were MPs Barry Campbell, Maurizio Bevilacqua and Joe Volpe; MPPs Tony Rizzo, John Sola, Monte Kwinter, Tony Ruprecht, Zanana Akande and Charles Harnick; Metro councillors Howard Moscoe and Norm Gardner; North York Councillor Mike Feldman; Vaughan Mayor Lorna Jackson; and Vaughan Councillor Bernie Green.

Joining them were Canadian Jewish Congress president Irving Abella, representatives of Christian-Jewish Dialogue, and a visiting Jewish couple from Buenos Aires, Moises Azzerrad and his wife, Florinda.

Sponsoring organizations were B'nai Brith Canada; the Canadian Zionist Federation, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and United Israel Appeal.

Government cutbacks irk senior citizens

Applaud call for special ministry

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Discontent over the NDP's policies of slashing OHIP payments for "snowbirds,", cutting some drugs off the free list, and boosting rates at homes for the aged and nursing homes surfaced at a public forum attended by 200 at the Bernard Betel Centre recently.

Perhaps the Ontario government went too far in reducing the out-of-province payments, Jenny Carter, NDP member for Peterborough and parliamentary assistant to the ministry which covers senior services, told the audience.

"If (the cut) is illegal it will be revoked," she promised

"You should have the courage to revoke it and start over again," said Charles Harnick, PC member for Willowdale, who earlier said the government had cut the out-of-province payments from $400 to $100 a day.

"What really galls me is that they (the government) know it is illegal," Harnick said. "They could delay the measure at least until it's known if it is illegal."

Loudest applause of the afternoon came in response to statements from the audience that seniors deserve a ministry of their own in the Ontario cabinet, and that eliminating some drugs from the free list will mean more seniors will sustain injuries in falls and cost the province even more in health costs.

(Senior services are now combined with other portfolios under Elaine Ziemba, minister of citizenship.)

Harnick opened the forum with a sharp attack on the NDP government. "The NDP decided to blame the seniors for rising health costs even though the number on welfare receiving benefits increased to 1.3 million in 1992. This was a politically motivated move. Seniors don't vote NDP but welfare recipients do."

Carter later denied that the government had targeted seniors and said putting the senior services portfolio in with other departments under Ziemba gave the seniors more political clout.

There are 35,000 seniors in Ontario paying an extra $12 a day in homes for the aged and nursing homes, an increase of 38 per cent, Dianne Poole, Liberal member for Eglinton, said. "The government is looking in the wrong places to cut spending," she said.

On cutting some drugs from the free list, Poole declared, "Some seniors can't take the generic brands, they get an allergic reaction; they're making our seniors go through hoops."

Twenty per cent of the residents in her riding are seniors, Poole said, double the provincial average. She said seniors face an increase of from 15 to 18 per cent in auto insurance premiums, and that delays in obtaining beds for long-term care are a serious concern.

The government is favoring welfare recipients over seniors in allowing free drugs, she said.

"We haven't got the shoulders to bear the burdens you are putting on us," said Betel member Sadie Rose in thanking the panel. "You have given us information but no plan."

Harnick said there are no ward rooms available for seniors who want to avoid the extra costs of semi-private rooms. Seniors are now prisoners in their own province because of the government's cut in out-of-province OHIP payments.

Forty per cent of seniors receive supplementary pensions and of that group, 80 per cent are women, said Bea Levis, co-chairman of the Ontario Senior Citizens Coalition. She is also a member of the Task Force on Transition Care. Most seniors are in the $20,000 to $35,000 income range, and only five per cent of Canadians have an income more than $50,000.

Cuts in the government's funding of homes for the aged and nursing homes means that residents "are lucky if they get a bath once a week," said Levis. "Unfortunate changes have been made in drug benefits. They are very discriminatory. Calcium pills are deleted. If it's a question of buying pills or food you know which way it will go."

Carter said positive moves by the NDP government on behalf of seniors include a seniors' bill of rights, a $15 million cancer straegy grant, allocations of $5.4 million to 20 quick response programs and an Advocacy Act.

She denied that the government had cut 234 drugs from the free list, saying generic drugs are just as good, or better. On the question of calcium pills, she said, "if you really need it, it will be made available."

Monte Kwinter, Liberal member for Wilson Heights, originally scheduled to speak, was in Hong Kong with a trade mission.

Lou Goldenberg was chairman.

Charbonneau's candidacy gets mixed reception

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The return of former labor leader Yvon Charbonneau to the public eye — this time as a candidate for the Quebec Liberal party — has stirred up bitter memories among some members of the Jewish community.

Premier Daniel Johnson confirmed Charbonneau's candidacy in Bourassa, the northeast Montreal riding held by former Liberal cabinet minister Louise Robic. The party considers Charbonneau quite a catch considering that he was once a strong voice for Quebec independence.

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) did not protest the selection of Charbonneau, whose strident anti-Zionism and open ties with Libya in the 1970s and early '80s as president of the largest teachers' union federation, outraged much of the Jewish community.

Lawrence Bergman, the Liberal candidate in the heavily Jewish riding of D'Arcy McGee, supports Johnson's decision.

John Parisella, coordinator of the Liberal campaign, told The CJN the party is satisfied Charbonneau does not have the same views as he did a decade ago and has been made aware of how much the party "cherishes the Jewish community."

Parisella said the party questioned Charbonneau about his Middle East stance and allegations of anti-Semitism, and found that his opinions had "evolved" and did not conflict with those of the party. "The world has changed and he has changed."

The clash between Charbonneau and the community reached its peak in June 1983 when Israeli defence minister Ariel Sharon visited Montreal to speak at a fundraiser for Jerusalem's Shaare Zedek Hospital, in the wake of the Sabra and Shatilla refugee camps massacre in Lebanon.

Charbonneau led the anti-Sharon forces, which included representatives of unions, the Parti Quebecois and St. Jean Baptiste Society, against a Jewish community coalition led by the Canada-Israel Committee. At the time, the community, including CJC, denounced Charbonneau for disseminating "pro-PLO propaganda" and for his association with the Tripoli-based organization EAFORD (Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination), set up by Libyan leader Muammar Khadafi using the United Nations' 'Zionism is racism' resolution as its leitmotif.

Parisella said Charbonneau was fighting for the rights of the Palestinians to a homeland, and though at that time this cause was associated with terrorism, today that struggle is almost resolved with the support of the international community.

Charbonneau, he added, always made a distinction between anti-Zionism and anti-Semitism. "He never had a problem with Jewish people."

Parisella observed that former longtime Liberal MP Marcel Prud'homme supported the Palestinians "and that never stopped people like Leo Kolber" raising funds for the federal Liberals.

Yvon Charbonneau

Charbonneau "should not be put on trial on the basis of the past. There are not many politicians who don't have something in their past. I think we should have the tolerance to believe people can evolve and change."

Parisella said the party first approached Charbonneau last spring and he refused at that time, having the previous October been appointed to a five-year term as vice-president of the province's Societe Quebecoise de Developpement de la Main-d'oeuvre, an agency for manpower retraining.

Parisella noted that his selection to this public position passed without controversy, indicating to the party Charbonneau was no longer a controversial figure. In fact, it was Charbonneau's second job with the government. In 1989, he was appointed head of a provincial inquiry into hazardous wastes, displacing the respected ex-cabinet minister, Victor Goldbloom.

In recent years, Charbonneau has also worked for the engineering firm Lavalin-SNC and headed his own public relations firm.

Parisella said Charbonneau has been a supporter of the Liberal party for six or seven years. "Most conversions are from federalism to sovereignty. Rarely do sovereigntists come to the Liberal side."

With Johnson's confirmation of Charbonneau, the nominee of the Bourassa riding association, businessman John De Luca, has stepped aside. De Luca, a member of the riding executive and the local Montreal Catholic School commissioner, said his first loyalty is to the party, but he could not hide his disappointment.

He grew up in the riding, lived there until 1½ years ago, and headed Robic's fundraising drives. He, like Charbonneau, now lives in nearby Riviere des Prairies district.

About a quarter of the riding's population is ethnic, mostly Italian, he said.

"I have nothing against Charbonneau. I met him and it went pretty well."

D'Arcy McGee independent candidate Robert Libman has not withdrawn his objection, and is using it against opponent Bergman. "This is a clear example of the Liberals' total disregard for the sensitivities of the Jewish and anglophone communities, and it further shows the ineffectiveness of the Liberal candidate in D'Arcy McGee who has been astonishingly silent on this issue."

Libman, the incumbent, is hoping the issue will convince voters that he can more forcefully speak out on their concerns than Bergman.

That same day, Bergman did speak publicly for the first time on the Charbonneau affair. In an open letter to constituents, he wrote that he had met with Charbonneau for a "frank discussion."

"We both agreed that the world has changed a great deal in the past 10 years. Mr. Charbonneau is clearly supportive of the current peace process which recognizes the existence of the State of Israel and the efforts made for a negotiated settlement in the Middle East with its neighbors.

"He has also asked that I recognize, and by extension all the constituents of D'Arcy McGee, that individuals and their ideas evolve over time."

Bergman said French- and English-speaking Quebecers have to "work in harmony" to promote political stability and economic growth.

Libman declined to apologize to the Ottawa-based National Council on Canada-Arab Relations. Its director, former MP Ian Watson, had called on Libman to apologize to Charbonneau, Arab-Canadians and "all those Canadians who are committed to the support of international law and the application of universal standards of human rights."

Libman's perceived offence was showing "an anti-Arab, anti-Palestinian bias" for denouncing Charbonneau's candidacy because of his "championing" of Palestinian rights in the past.

"It is Mr. Charbonneau who owes an apology to the Jewish community for his vehement attacks against it and Israel," Libman insisted.

"Charbonneau's association with the likes of Muammar Khadafi should be abhorrent to Canadian Arabs as it is to Canadian Jews and all Canadians."

David Reichmann dies at 34

JERUSALEM — David Reichmann, son of Ralph and Ada Reichmann of Toronto, died in Israel on August 2 of a heart attack. He was 34.

He was stricken while returning to his home in Bnei Brak from Tel Aviv. Police found him in his car by the side of the road.

Besides his parents, he leaves his wife Rachele and five young children, and three brothers and one sister.

He was buried the next day in Bnei Brak. Among the thousands attending the funeral was Rabbi Eliezer Schach, who heads the Ponevezh Yeshivah where Reichmann had studied.

Reichmann's father, brother of Paul and Albert, owns the Olympia Tile company. The Reichmann family are known for their philanthropic endeavors in Israel and the Diaspora.

David Reichmann and his family made aliyah three years ago. He had previously worked for Olympia Tile in Toronto.

In 1992, he founded Darcom Communications, an Israel-based telecommunications company. The company, which provides private long-distance lines, set up communications links between the U.S. Embassy in Tel Aviv and the State Department in Washington, and between Israel and several Arab countries.

Forbes, a leading U.S. business magazine, reported a month ago that Darcom had "opened shop" recently in South Africa and the United Kingdom and was planning to enter the western European market.

Darcom lost a "young man with a highly developed business sense," said Zvi Amid, the firm's chief executive officer.

Even as he dreamed of turning his company into an international telecommunications giant, Reichmann maintained his family's devotion to Torah and learning. His daily Torah study, he said, helped keep his priorities in order as he spent the day building his business.

Visitors describe life of average Israeli teenager

CJN Maritimes Correspondent

HALIFAX — Six Israeli teenagers are spending four weeks in Canada this summer, trying to convince their peers that Israeli teens listen to Metallica, play Nintendo, love to shop and do all the things teens in other parts of the world do — but with a slight difference.

"We are mostly asked about the peace process in the Middle East, something we are living every day" said Einav Haim, a member of the Or Yehuda group visiting small Jewish communities in Atlantic Canada and Ontario. "Peace is our life, our future."

And if you ask the six young people if there will be peace, you will get six different answers.

"We can't give a straight answer to the people asking us because we all see peace in different ways," said Yosi Arviv.

The six teens, all 17, live at Or Yehuda, a community of 25,000 people outside Tel Aviv. They have been in Canada since July 11 and will leave for home August 16.

Their town was established in 1949 ("from a dump," said Haim) as a refuge for Sephardi Jews from the Middle East.

"It was a distressed area," said Anthony Lowenstein of Toronto, the group's leader on the one-month Canadian speaking tour of summer camps and community gatherings. "There was a high crime rate, high infant mortality and high illiteracy."

In 1976, Menachim Begin decided Diaspora Jews should take the responsibility of rehabilitating such communities. A twinning process took place and Or Yehuda was joined with the small communties of Atlantic Canada and southern Ontario.

With support from those communities, "our community went from black to white," said Arviv. "There were miraculous changes and today there is industry, much better housing, adult education, almost 100 per cent literacy, the lowest infant mortality rate in Israel, and 90 per cent of high school graduates go on to university."

During their three-day visit to Camp Kadimah, 100 km from Halifax, the Israelis offered a dramatic presentation in which they played Palestinians and Israelis expressing their hopes and fears about the peace process. Later, they participated in small group sessions and even one-on-one situations with campers and staff, talking about Israel.

"We were amazed that the people hear only the bad things about Israel, about death and war," said Tali Haviv. She said it's not easy to live in Israel "but it is not just war. We are teens like everyone else. We have entertainment, pubs, rock bands and the same interests as teens anywhere."

What amazes the visitors is the feelings Canadian teens have for Israel. "People here feel Israel is their own. They want to live there and serve in the army," said Shag Elattr, who, with his mates, will enter the Israeli army within the next year.

"Going to the army will mature us," he said. "And we want to give to our country. Most of us have brothers and sisters and parents who have served, or are serving, in the army. It's a tradition."

The Or Yehuda tour visited Saint John and Moncton, N.B., Prince Edward Island, where they saw the stage production of Anne Of Green Gables, Halifax, Springhill, Kentville and Sydney, N.B., and several Ontario communities including Ottawa, Kingston, Muskoka, London, Windsor and camps in Hamilton and Toronto. They also performed at Camp B'nai Brith in Montreal.

Haim said she sets great satisfaction connecting with Canadians. "We have done song and dance with them, taught some Hebrew words and talked about peace."

Elattr interjected, "And we're learning about the Canadian culture. We'll take some of that back to Israel with us, too."

Community activist to head medical centre support group

MONTREAL — Longtime Jewish community activist Julius Briskin has been appointed national executive director of the newly established Canadian chapter of the Children's Medical Centre of Israel (CMCI).

Opened in October 1992 in Petach Tikvah, the CMCI is the only facility in the region providing full medical service exclusively for children. It is also a teaching medical centre affiliated with the Sackler School of Medicine at Tel Aviv University.

The seven-floor, ultra-modern building houses 224 beds, 60 per cent of them for day patients and emergencies and the remainder for longer-term patients.

Briskin, a Montreal lawyer, most recently served as national executive vice-president of the State of Israel Bonds in Canada (1983 to 1991). He was a senior partner in the law firm of Masse, Briskin, Bouchard & Associates and from 1957 to 1963 was agent to the federal minister of justice in tax evasion, narcotics and fraud.

His is a founding president of the Inter-Service Clubs Council of Quebec, organizer of the CFCF Television Telethon of Stars for research into children's diseases at the Montreal Children's Hospital and Hopital Ste. Justine, past chair of Bnai Brith-Eastern Canada, chair of the 1976 Montreal Olympic Ball and latterly campaign director of the Jewish Rehabilitation Hospital expansion campaign.

Julius Briskin

Briskin emphasized that the CMCI is open to all children of Israel and the Middle East, regardless of religion, race, nationality or ethnic origin. "It serves as a humanitarian bridge to peace," he said.

"Since the operation began, CMCI doctors have attracted international attention with breakthroughs and innovations. It is now time for Canadian Jewry to learn more about this great facility."

National headquarters for the Canadian arm of CMCI are located in Montreal. A national executive will be formed shortly. Programming is expected to begin in the fall. For more information on the CMCI, Briskin can be reached at (514) 343-9840.

EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR

The YM-YWHA of Montreal is inviting applications from qualified individuals to lead the Association into the 21st century. As the Jewish Community Centre of Montreal, the Y offers a full range of programs in pre-school, social, recreation and lifestyle, health and physical education, camping and the arts.

As the Executive Director of one of the largest Jewish agencies in Canada, the successful candidate will interact with the lay and professional leadership of the Montreal Jewish community, the general community and government bodies. A successful record as chief executive of a large agency, with proven skills in leadership development, strategic planning, program development, fundraising and administration are the prime selection criteria. Bilingualism is an asset. Compensation is excellent and is commensurate with qualifications and experience.

Qualified individuals are invited to send their résumés and salary requirements in confidence to:

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer FRED M. CATZMAN has been researching their origins over the past few years. Mr. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

KRIEGSMAN — KRIEGER

I received an interesting letter from Vahn Pailakian, of Montreal, enquiring not about his unusual surname, but that of an American friend named Kriegsman. The suggestion is that since Kriegsman literally means a warrior or a quarrelsome person it is an odd name for any person to adopt.

The problem arises from a curious pronunciation of the German and Yiddish word Krug — which means a jug or a mug. Correspondingly, Kruger denotes an innkeeper who sold beer by the tankard. Krieger and Kriegsman are misspellings of Kruger.

My correspondent's surname is more difficult. It appears to emanate from a place name that attracted pelicans.

Israel/Jordan border crossing opens for tourism

By BILL GLADSTONE
CJN Travel Reporter

TORONTO — A new era in Middle East tourism dawned this week as Israel and Jordan opened a border crossing for tourists between the neighbouring Red Sea resort towns of Eilat and Aqaba.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin crossed the frontier Monday morning to make his first formal visit to Jordan. He was King Hussein's lunch guest at the royal palace in Aqaba and then took a short trip on the royal yacht.

Israel Television reported Sunday night that Hussein may visit Israel as early as this Friday.

U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher, in the region for another round of shuttle diplomacy, became the first to traverse the new Arava crossing. Monday, he drove the five km stretch from Aqaba to Eilat.

The formal inauguration was attended by Rabin, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, Chief Justice Meir Shamgar, IDF Chief of Staff Gen. Ehud Barak and other government leader.

Representing Jordan was King Hussein's brother, Crown Prince Hassan. There was no explanation of why Hussein did not attend.

A group of 40 Spaniards were the first tourists to use the crossing.

The Eilat-Aqaba crossing was to open this week to all ordinary tourists in Israel holding valid passports, provided they stay in Jordan at least one night before returning to Israel.

"As of [this] Tuesday, it'll be as easy as crossing the border to Buffalo," said Ruth Ben-Tzur, director of the Israel Government Tourist Office (IGTO) in Canada, at a press conference last week in Toronto. "Canadians who have become accustomed to easy entry into the United States will appreciate the same situation in the Middle East."

Until this week, a tourist wishing to cross from Israel to Jordan could do so only at the Allenby Bridge, east of Jericho, and only if his or her passport did not contain an Israeli stamp. Once admitted into Jordan, the traveller was not permitted to cross back into Israel.

Like Eilat, Aqaba is a resort town that trades on the perennially sunny weather, pure sand beaches and excellent diving and recreational opportunities of the Red Sea. However, it lacks the nightlife and big hotels of its Israeli sister; it has about 2,400 hotel rooms, versus about 7,500 in Eilat.

Last year, the absence of a crossing between the two cities posed a ticklish diplomatic problem when a horse belonging to King Hussein swam from Aqaba to Eilat. To return the animal to its rightful owner, the Israelis transported it north to Jericho, a five-hour ride, then gave it to the Jordanians at the Allenby Bridge. The horse was then shipped back to Aqaba, another five-hour highway journey.

Situated three km north of Eilat, the new border crossing point gives foreign tourists to Israel unprecedented access to the spectacular rose-red city of Petra, roughly an hour-and-a-half north of Aqaba by car along the King's Highway.

Considered one of the wonders of the ancient world, Petra is a city carved from solid rock by the Nabateans, and accessible mainly through a narrow, winding canyon known as the Siq.

Ironically, although many Israelis long to visit Petra, they will not be permitted to cross into Jordan until an official peace treaty between the two countries is signed.

Only third-party nationals — not Israelis or Jordanians — may cross between Eilat and Aqaba.

Israeli tourism officials, along with their counterparts in Egypt and Jordan, have innovative plans for the area they have dubbed the "Red Sea Riviera" — the 30-km-long, horseshoe-shaped stretch of coastline that runs from the Egyptian resort of Taba, through Eilat and Aqaba, to Jordan's boundary with Saudia Arabia.

Tourism officials are preparing a large international promenade that features shops, restaurants, new hotels and other touristic attractions, including a pedestrian and bicycle path. "Imagine the thrill of being able to ride your bike through three countries," said Howard English, a public relations consultant who works with the IGTO.

Famous Red Sea coral reefs

Israeli, Jordanian and Egyptian tourism officials are also jointly planning an underwater park where divers may explore the famous coral reefs of the Red Sea without worrying about inadvertently crossing an international boundary. (As of this week, windsurfers and waterskiers in the Gulf of Eilat needn't be concerned about carrying passports, either; no national coast guard will harrass them if they inadvertently sail over the border).

Tourist submarines will also move freely through these waters, which are to be marked with submerged signs announcing geographical locations.

Other planned projects include a Spice Trail Park, tracing the route of ancient spice merchants, and The Lowest Point On Earth Park in the Dead Sea area, featuring the health and healing centres of both Israel and Jordan.

According to Ben-Tzur, two more border crossing points — on the north and south sides of the Dead Sea — will open between Israel and Jordan in coming months, and two additional border crossing points will eventually give Jordan access to Ashdod and other Mediterranean seaports, providing invaluable shipping channels for freight.

According to IGTO figures, some 40,000 Canadians visited Israel in 1993. Ben-Tzur expects the number to climb steadily as more peace gains are achieved.

"As of Tuesday, Egypt, Israel, and Jordan form a beautiful touristic triangle that opens a whole new world for Canadian tourists," she said. "At the least, we expect to double the number of Canadians going to Israel next year."

Although Israel and Jordan have yet to declare a formal peace, popular sentiment in both countries seems increasingly congenial. Israeli television camera operators were recently permitted into Jordan, Ben-Tzur related, and conducted on-the-street interviews in Amman with ordinary Jordanians, most of whom spoke positively about peace for Israeli television. "We feel that we have friendly people on the other side of the border. That's just as important than a piece of paper."

Ben-Tzur related that she recently watched children on a Dead Sea kibbutz release hundreds of coloured balloons bearing messages of peace, which the wind carried over the border into Jordan. "We saw the Jordanian kids running after the balloons, catch them, and wave to us," she said. "You didn't even need binoculars."

Canadian Jews join JDC's Rwandan relief efforts

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

Marilyn Aarons-Guttman

Steve Drysdale

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish organizations are climbing on board in the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC)'s relief efforts to aid Rwandan refugees.

Mazon Canada, which distributes funds to grassroots organizations fighting hunger, announced last week that it was making its largest single allocation ever of $5,000 to the JDC.

Meanwhile, the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress, in conjunction with the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, last week established the Rwandan Relief Fund. The Fund will raise money in Canada that will be channelled to the JDC for use in providing shelters, water purification units and medical aid for Rwandans in refugee camps in Tanzania, said Congress spokesman Daniel Fine.

Congress and the Federation established the relief fund to give Canadian Jews the opportunity to aid Rwandans through reputable Jewish organizations, Fine said.

"It will be a Jewish response to the Rwandan tragedy. We can draw on our history for a uniquely Jewish response," he said.

In Montreal, Federation CJA is offering a similar opportunity for those wishing to aid in Rwandan relief. Federation executive-director Steve Drysdale said cheques made out to Federation CJA and marked for Rwandan relief will be forwarded to the JDC.

B'nai Brith Canada added its voice to the chorus of those urging a Jewish response to the Rwandan tragedy, calling on the Jewish community to support relief agencies.

And the government of Israel, in conjunction with Magen David Adom, has started its own emergency relief fund named Israel for Rwandan Refugees. Donations to the fund will be used to purchase equipment vital to the Israeli relief effort in Goma, Zaire.

On July 25, the first of eight Israeli Hercules transport planes landed in Goma, ferrying in a contingent of about 50 medical staff and an additional 30 auxiliary personnel to operate an IDF field hospital.

The response of the Jewish community to the Congress/Federation effort has been generous, Fine said. In the first two days, the fund received about 75 cheques including "quite a few $100 cheques."

In addition, Congress and the Federation have sent a letter to rabbis and executive directors of Ontario synagogues urging them "to enlist the support of your congregants to aid in providing a Jewish response to this crisis." The letter goes on to ask the rabbis to "make mention of this initiative during your Shabbat sermon."

Congress has had regular contact with the JDC over the past few years and about a year and a half ago, airlifted pharmaceuticals and clothing to the former Yugoslavia through the JDC, Fine said.

Marilyn Aarons-Guttman, executive director of Mazon, said the organization's executive committee gave unanimous consent to the Rwanda relief effort.

"The need for humanitarian aid is obvious," she said. "The Jewish community in North America is horrified and wants very badly to help these people."

Aarons-Guttman said the emergency allocation is Mazon's second such transfer in under a year. She said Mazon's largest ever allocation up to that time took place last fall when $4,000 was sent through JDC for relief efforts in Bosnia.

Those wishing to participate in the Congress/Federation relief effort can make their cheques payable to the United Jewish Welfare Fund: Rwanda Relief and send them to the Rwanda Relief Fund, 4600 Bathurst St., Willowdale, Ont., M2R 3V2.

B'nai Brith is offering a similar service for those who wish to make a contribution to Rwandan relief through a familiar Jewish agency. B'nai Brith will distribute money to the appropriate relief agencies, the fraternal agency said in a news release. Donations may be sent to: B'nai Brith Foundation, 15 Hove Street, Downsview, Ont., M3H 4Y8, Re: Rwanda relief.

Those wishing to aid the Israeli program can make cheques payable to Israel Leman Plitei Ruanda and forward donations to: Israel Leman Plitei Ruanda, c/o Bank Leumi, Yad Eliahu Branch (No. 814), Derech Moshe Dayan 64, Tel Aviv, Israel, Account No. 280000/07.

Alan Rose leaves Congress

Will serve on Immigration and Refugee Board

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The names Alan Rose and Canadian Jewish Congress have been synonymous for a quarter-century.

Whether it was campaigning for Soviet Jewish emigration, making claims for restitution from Germany, representing Jewish concerns in Ottawa or dialoguing with Christians, Rose was in the forefront.

Those days have quietly come to an end as Rose, 73, prepares to begin his new duties Aug. 22 as a member of Canada's Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) determining refugee claims in the Montreal regional office.

The three-year appointment, made by cabinet, was one of 27 announced in June by Immigration Minister Sergio Marchi. Rose joined Congress in 1970.

"I felt it was time for a generational change," Rose said of his new job. "My time had come...I think I leave with my reputation, if not polished, at least untarnished."

Rose, who has been Congress' national executive vice-president since 1977, said he never considered retirement.

At the IRB, Rose will be working full-time from an office in Complexe Guy Favreau. He admitted he will miss his Congress office.

Rose would not say much about his opinions on immigration other than to note that "most Jews were refugees once." He thinks he has the compassion necessary to hear refugee claims, but wonders if he has "the wisdom of Solomon" to decide who can stay and who must go.

Alan Rose

Born in Scotland, Rose served in the British army during World War II as a tank officer and was among the liberators of the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp.

He emigrated to Canada in 1957 and worked for the Jewish Agency and the forerunner of the Canada-Israel Committee until coming to Congress in 1970 as assistant director. Those were the days when Congress was run by Sam Bronfman and right-hand man Saul Hayes.

His said his greatest achievement in his communal career was gaining freedom for Soviet Jews thanks to pressure from the Canadian government and the Jewish community. "We were one of the best organized communities in the world," he said. "We had a parliamentary committee for Soviet Jewry that including virtually every MP. We were effective in using the Helsinki Final Act (an international agreement on human rights) as a lever against the Soviet Union."

Rose also threw himself into the effort to get Ethopian Jews to Israel, visiting that African state three times.

Rose said Congress officers asked him to stay until 1995. He does not know if his position will be filled. If not, national Congress staff in Montreal will be reduced to three. He thinks Congress will eventually centre its national operations in Ottawa, but much depends on the outcome of the Quebec election.

"The increased professionalism of the Jewish community has enabled it to be an engine of social change, affecting not only Jews, but all Canadians," he said.

He also said Congress has made great strides in generating "tremendous goodwill" in Ottawa, translating into friendly relations between the government and the Jewish community and Israel. "We are regarded in Ottawa as amongst the most persuasive advocates.

"Over the years, we have built up a large network of contacts with parliamentarians and civil servants by being moderate and working within the parameters of what is possible."

Being a Jewish communal civil servant has not always been easy, he admitted. There have been "spiteful and petty" people among the lay people he has worked with, but they were the exceptions, he emphasized. Rose is proud of "never having compromised [his] principles," no matter how much heat he received.

What touches him most are the many letters he has received from people whom he helped in some small way, people like Holocaust survivors who needed help to get pensions.

Kagedan appointed to immigration post

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — Ian Kagedan, one of 27 people recently appointed to the Immigration and Refugee Board, began his education in refugee and immigration matters at the family dinner table. His father served as the executive vice-president of the Jewish Immigration Aid Service in Montreal.

"I grew up in a home very conscious of immigration and refugee affairs and I think I grew up with a great sensitivity to the situation of newcomers to this country, whether as immigrants or refugees," Kagedan said.

To take up his new duties, Kagedan is leaving his position as director of government relations for B'nai Brith Canada, where he was responsible for keeping various levels of government and ambassadors abreast of B'nai Brith policy.

Ian Kagedan

Of particular concern to him during his five-year tenure was the rise in racism, anti-Semitism and hate crimes in Western democratic and the former communist countries. Two years ago he helped organize a conference in Toronto on racism, anti-Semitism and xenophobia. And last year he was a member of a small B'nai Brith delegation that went to observe Germany's response to increasing racism and attacks against foreigners.

"He was a human sponge," said Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith and mission leader. "He was able to absorb a great amount of data and then make a brilliant analysis of it."

Although saddened to see Kagedan leave B'nai Brith, Dimant said he is delighted about the appointment. He said Kagedan's commitment and grasp of the issues makes him a wise choice for the job.

"I think that Ian has a tremendously good sense of judgement and he will do the government proud," Dimant said.

Kagedan began his career as a lecturer in religious studies at the University of Winnipeg. He went on to be the director of community relations for the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council and then joined Canadian Jewish Congress.

It was about that time that a boatload of Sri Lankan refugees was rescued off the East Coast. The government panicked, and Kagedan got involved preparing briefs about refugee and immigration issues as the Conservative government drafted its new immigration legislation.

As a democracy and a "freedom-loving" nation, Canada has an obligation to provide asylum for people fleeing intolerable situations, Kagedan says. "We should never get into a situation where we close our doors."

That doesn't mean Canada should bear the brunt of the refugee crisis, he added, but it must do its share.

"People don't want to leave their country, people love their countries. When my ancestors came from Europe they didn't leave because they wanted to, they left because their lives were threatened. It's a horrible situation to be in, to leave the place of your birth because it's turned into a toxic environment."

Kagedan and his fellow board members were, for the first time, selected through consultations with people outside government. In the past, the Conservative government, which established the board, appointed the members and was accused of patronage.

All the new members have backgrounds in advocacy or immigration law.

Ottawa immigration lawyer Ian Fine said although the board members in Ottawa have been excellent, he applauds the new selection process.

"We're dealing here with people's lives and when you're dealing with people's lives you want the people who judge [them] to know what they are talking about."

230-year-old Quebec cemetery named national historic site

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — For only the second time, a Jewish site in Canada is about to be named a National Historic Site by the Canadian government.

The venerable Beth Israel cemetery of Quebec City, which dates back to 1852, will be designated a national historic site August 18, at a special ceremony hosted by the Heritage Ministry at the cemetery.

"This is Canada's oldest existing Jewish community cemetery, and probably the oldest visual testimony of Jews in Canada," said Frank Toker, a Quebec native and professor of architectural history at the University of Pittsburgh who has relatives interred at the cemetery. "There is no building standing that is earlier than that."

The only other Jewish national historic site is the Congregation Emanu-el in Victoria, B.C. Built in 1863, it is Canada's oldest functioning synagogue and was named a national historical site in 1983.

There are about 750 designated historic sites across the country.

The Beth Israel cemetery, situated on St. Cyrille Boulevard in the suburb of Ste. Foy, won approval despite some long odds and a lengthy review process.

According to Laurence Friend, chair of the Historic Sites and Monuments Board of Canada, until 1990 the Heritage Ministry would not consider commemorating cemeteries if their historical value came only from connection to early settlements.

The Beth Israel cemetery fulfilled two of three criteria the board put into place after 1990: it contained "a concentration of noteworthy mausolea, monuments, markers, or horticultural specimens," and was "an exceptional example of a landscape expressing a distinctive cultural tradition."

Any one of those criteria, Friend said, made the Beth Israel cemetery eligible for consideration as a national historic site.

As part of the application, Jacqueline Hucker, a director of Heritage Canada's architectural history branch, prepared an "agenda paper" containing a vivid and richly-detailed history and description of the Quebec City Jewish community and Beth Israel cemetery.

The first known Jewish residents of Quebec City arrived in 1759, the year of the British conquest. But there was no minyan, Hucker notes, until 1852, when the Jewish population of the city reached 40.

Land for the Beth Israel cemetery was acquired sometime between the later 1840s to 1858, according to different reports, but Toker said it was probably 1852, the year the first minyan was formed. The first Quebec City map to show the cemetery is dated 1867.

The cemetery was privately owned by a Jewish merchant, Charles Shapeara, until he ceded it to the Beth Israel Corporation in 1894. Shapeara is buried in the cemetery.

The cemetery was enlarged but later reduced in size in 1965 — to 280 ft. by 220 ft. — to allow for the widening of St. Cyrille Boulevard. The contents of disturbed graves were shipped to Jerusalem for reburial.

About 300 markers remain, and the cemetery is still in use. It has undergone two restorations and has also been vandalized on occasion.

According to Hucker, the Beth Israel cemetery qualified for the special designation in part because, along with the Spanish and Portuguese/Shaar Hashomayim cemetery in Montreal, they "are the only extant cemeteries directly associated with more than 230 years of continuous Jewish settlement in Canada."

Although "It is uncontestable," Hucker writes, "that the Montreal cemetery is larger and contains a wider selection of characteristic Jewish markers and religious symbols...its continuing development into the 20th century overwhelms the smaller 19th century section.

For the Quebec City Jewish community of 35 families, the designation is seen as important both symbolically and substantively.

Symbolically, because it constitutes a national recognition of the Jewish presence in Quebec since 1759. Substantively, because the designation could play a role in the community's desire to see the cemetery maintained in perpetuity if the community disappears.

Ena Robinson, 76, is among those in the community who want to see the cemetery maintained.

It was Robinson, as a member of the Beth Israel Ohav Shalom Synagogue, who had the congregation form a corporation to afford the cemetery a measure of legal protection if the synagogue ever stopped functioning.

Meanwhile, however, the cemetery has been able to maintain its own chevrah kadishah, or burial society, and Robinson said the community and synagogue are still functioning well under Rabbi Samuel Rogers.

In Toker's view the historic designation will be the surest guarantee that the cemetery will stay intact, not because the status will provide maintenance funding, which it will not, but it will reinforce the idea that "the community has to care for the cemetery and to see how important it is," he said.

U.S. places Nazi doctor on 'watch list'

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — The U.S. government has placed Dr. Hans Sewing, a leading German physician, on its "watch list" of undesirable aliens after the Justice Department found he had participated in Nazi-sponsored acts of persecution, the World Jewish Congress reported recently.

The ban on Sewering's entry into the United States follows by a year and a half his resignation as elected president of the World Medical Association after documents found in German archives were released showing Sewering had been a member of the Nazi Party and the Nazi SS.

The WJC had asked the U.S. Justice Department to investigate Sewering's wartime activities.

According to the uncovered documents, in 1943 Sewering signed an order transferring a handicapped 14-year-old girl to a so-called "healing clinic," where she was soon killed, along with hundreds of other patients, in the Nazis' "euthanasia" program.

'Euthanasia' program

Although Sewering acknowledged signing the transfer order, he had denied knowing the clinic was a euthanasia centre. He had said that the Roman Catholic Church, which ran the clinic, would support his claim.

Instead, the hospital's director and four nuns on staff rejected his explanation.

They released a statement saying, "In the interest of the memory of these criminally murdered people, we cannot remain silent any longer. The sisters knew that these severely physically and mentally handicapped people would be exterminated as so-called 'unworthy lives.' "

The Justice Department said Sewering had been placed on the "watch list" for having "ordered, incited, assisted or otherwise participated" in persecution "because of race, religion, national origin or political opinion."

Charges against Sewering were first made by the German magazine Der Spiegel. The campaign to bar him from becoming the medical association's president was initiated by Prof. Michael Kochen of the University of Gottingen, Germany, and doctors from Canada, Israel and the United States.

Sewering lives in Dachau, Germany, the site of the wartime death camp.

Work continues on Jewish museum

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

BERLIN — Work on the Jewish Museum, an extension of the Berlin Museum, is well under way.

The DM130 million project — which had been plagued by financial troubles — is expected to be finished in 1997, according to museum official Dominik Bartmann.

The complex is on Lindenstrasse, near what was Checkpoint Charlie, an entry point into former East Germany.

The zigzag building is shaped like a lightning bolt, with a hollow space running through it to symbolize the near-destruction by the Nazis of Germany's Jewish community.

Dominik Bartmann

It was designed by Daniel Libeskind, a Lodz-born architect whose parents are Holocaust survivors.

In a competition, he beat out more than 160 architects to win the commission.

The museum was originally scheduled to be finished in 1995, the 50th anniversary of the end of World War II.

But fiscal restraint, caused by the enormous costs incurred by German unification since 1990, delayed the much-discussed project.

City officials consider the museum important in maintaining cordial relations with the local Jewish community.

Before the rise of the Third Reich, Berlin was home to about 185,000 Jews. Today, the figure is down to 10,000. Nevertheless, Berlin still has the largest Jewish community in Germany, whose overall registered Jewish population is 43,000.

Wolfgang Nagel, the senator in charge of construction and housing in Berlin, says the museum is intended to be "a meeting place of German-Jewish traditions which promotes, at the same time, an examination of our own history."

Currently, the Jewish collection in the Berlin Museum is displayed in two exhibition halls in different areas of the city. One is on the ground floor of the old Berlin Museum. The other is in the Martin Gropius building, close to the former headquarters of the Gestapo.

The collection consists of religious objects, paintings, craftwork, documents and photographs.

The exhibits in the new Jewish Museum will be divided into three categories — Judaism, German Jewry and the Holocaust, and the contributions of Jews to German society over the centuries.

The News in Brief

No to Haiti Invasion

TEL AVIV — Israel has rejected an American request to join a UN-sponsored international military force for a possible invasion of Haiti.

Speaking on Army Radio last week, Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin said Israel was willing to send humanitarian assistance to Haiti.

But he ruled out sending members of the Israel Defence Force, saying the climate in the Middle East prevented Israel from taking such a move.

Despite Israel's decision, the U.S. request marked the first time the Jewish state has been included in UN planning for an international military operation.

U.S. Fighter Jets Arrive

TEL AVIV — A first group of six F-16 fighter jets the United States promised to deliver to Israel arrived at an Israeli air force base earlier this month.

The six planes were part of a larger package of 50 F-16's, which are scheduled for delivery over the coming months.

The modern fighter jets, which come from U.S. Air Force surplus stocks, were promised by the United States in appreciation for Israel's cooperation with the allied forces during the 1991 Persian Gulf War.

Stabbing Victim Dies

JERUSALEM — Yoram Sakuri, a Kiryat Netafim resident stabbed by terrorists in his home July 1, died of his wounds last week.

Sakuri, 30, is survived by his wife and four children. He was buried last Tuesday in Tiberias.

A terrorist broke into Sakuri's home at the edge of the settlement the day PLO head Yasser Arafat came to Gaza, stabbing him and his wife, who were asleep. Sakuri was critically wounded while his wife Hanna was hospitalized with moderate wounds.

Mansur Atef Riyan, from the nearby village of Karawat Bani Hassan, was arrested. According to the IDF, he admitted carrying out the attack to clear his name after Hamas accused him of collaborating with Israel.

Terrorist Cell Uncovered

JERUSALEM — A PLO-affiliated terrorist cell that was organized and operated after PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat vowed his organization had given up terror has been uncovered by Jerusalem police.

A court order prohibiting the publication of details of the case was lifted in late July. Police turned the case over to the prosecutor, recommending that charges be brought against the 11 members for nine fire-bombings and dozens of stone-throwing incidents.

The gang was organized by the PLO-affiliated Fatah Hawks but included members identified with Hamas, a Jerusalem police spokesman said in a statement.

IDF Soldier Shot

TEL AVIV — An Israel Defence Force soldier was lightly wounded last Tuesday when shots were fired at the Army minibus in which he was traveling through the Hebron Hills, in the West Bank.

The shots were fired from a car that sped by on the road. No other passengers were hurt.

Army reinforcements summoned to the scene and gave chase but the assailants fled into a nearby village.

The car used by the gunmen was later found abandoned on the outskirts of Hebron. It had been stolen recently from within Israel's pre-1967 borders.

Flap Over Mezuzot

JERUSALEM — Diaspora Jews wary of terror attacks after the recent series of bombings may remove mezuzot from their outer doorposts, former Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Shlomo Goren said last Friday.

Rabbi Goren said recent circumstances made it permissible to move the mezuzot to the inner doorpost.

His comments drew criticism from Haifa Chief Rabbi Shar-Yeshuv Cohen, who was quoted as saying that "despite the danger, Jews must not hide their identity."

Fascist Film Follies

ROME — Alessandra Mussolini, granddaughter of Italy's wartime fascist dictator and a right-wing member of Parliament, was unsuccessful in her attempt to have an Israeli-made film about her withdrawn from a film festival last week in Sicily.

The film, In the Name of the Duce, was shot by Israeli director Amos Gitai during Mussolini's losing electoral campaign for mayor of Naples last fall.

A communique issued last week by Mussolini's party, the National Alliance, said the film was a distortion of reality.

The Milan daily Corriere della Sera said Gitai and his crew were thrown out of Mussolini's office, and filmed the entire scene.

Gitai said Mussolini demanded the documentary be withdrawn from the festival without having seen it. "The blind reactions of Mussolini reveal the mentality and methods of the right, ready to repress the free exercise of information," he told reporters.

Rabin, Peres Reconcile

JERUSALEM — Long-time rivals Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and Foreign Minister Shimon Peres held a "reconciliation" meeting last month, at which they apparently agreed to put aside differences and work together for peace.

No details of the two-hour meeting were revealed but Labor sources said differences between the two had been ironed out.

It is now hoped within Labor that both men will work together to solve internal problems as well, such as Labor's difficult financial situation and the divisions resulting from the Histadrut elections.

Rabin implied that there were no ideological differences between himself and Peres, and said that the personal disputes are not relevant "to the heart of the peace process.

Rabin Orders Dig Stopped

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin last week ordered the suspension of archaeological excavations near the planned city of Modi'in after objections from ultra-Orthodox Jews.

Rabin's decision was protested by the Israeli Association of Archaeologists, which called it a dangerous precedent and a capitulation to the haredim.

The haredim say the archaeologists are violating Jewish law by digging up bones. They say the bones are buried in a graveyard dating to the Second Temple period.

Rabin said the suspension would stand until an understanding could be reached with Sephardic Chief Rabbi Eliyahu Bakshi-Doron.

Rabbi Bakshi-Doron reportedly said he would request a permanent end to the Modi'in digs.

Stephen Breyer Confirmed

WASHINGTON — Stephen Breyer, whose nomination was confirmed by the U.S. Senate last month by an overwhelming majority, will join Ruth Bader Ginsburg this fall as the second Jewish justice to sit on the current United States Supreme Court.

Many Jewish groups backed Breyer's nomination, noting his pro-choice position on abortion and strong support for the separation of church and state and protection of religious minorities.

The Senate vote was 87-9 in favor of confirmation.

Among those opposed was Sen. Richard Lugar (R-Ind.), who cited a controversial investment with a Lloyd's of London syndicate, calling it "extraordinarily bad judgment" that could compromise Breyer's rulings.

JIAS turns down Israeli refugees

In Toronto, the director of the Jewish Immigrant Aid Society (JIAS) said the organization does not provide services to applicants from democratic countries. Perry Romberg said this would apply to refugee claimants from Israel, Great Britain, or France.

"The word is out that we don't help Israelis seeking refugee status so we don't hear from them," he said.

Romberg said "the agency respects and thinks highly of the IRB for its concern for refugees; thank G-d we have it. But we find it unsettling to learn that people from Israel are claiming refugee status. Israel is not known to persecute its own citizens. It is a democracy of the finest order."

At the same time, he said the number of immigrant applictions from former Soviet residents is increasing. These are people who qualify for entrance to Canada under the immigration regulations, and not as refugees. In some cases, they have lived in Israel for two or three years.

Islamic terrorists blamed for attack in Panama

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PANAMA CITY — The Panamanian Jewish community and international law-enforcement officials now believe that last month's bombing of a Panamanian commuter plane, in which 21 people were killed — 12 of them Jewish — was part of a wave of terrorist attacks targeting Jews around the world.

Earlier theories about the explosion linked the attack to the allegedly shady dealings of one of the Jewish passengers on board, Saul Schwartz.

Schwartz reportedly was under investigation by Italian authorities for links to the Colombian-based Medellin cocaine cartel.

Last year, Schwartz, a gold dealer, was kidnapped and later released, according to sources familiar with the Panamanian community. The kidnapping was believed tied to the drug cartel, community sources said.

But "the Jewish community (of Panama) has largely been discounting the initial reports of some possible ties to a Colombian cartel because of the 12 Jews on the plane, including the three Israelis," said Warren Eisenberg, director of the International Council of B'nai B'rith.

Eisenberg, who has been in touch with the Panamanian branch of B'nai Brith, noted that Schwartz had not been expected to be on that plane, which was en route from Colon, a commercial free-trade center, to Panama City. The route is one commonly taken by Jewish business executives.

The other 11 Jewish passengers were daily commuters on that particular flight, said Eisenberg.

Israel Radio reported last Monday that Panamanian authorities had detained one Lebanese and two Iranians for suspected involvement in the July 19 downing of the plane. However, they were released the following day for lack of evidence.

Among the other indications pointing to the involvement of Islamic terrorists, said Eisenberg, was the discovery of a body in the wreckage, believed to be of Middle Eastern origin, and which was covered with more explosive material than any other body on the plane.

Eisenberg was among a number of Jewish leaders who attended meetings late last month in Washington of the Organization of American States and later, at the House of Representatives on terrorist attacks in Latin America and Britain.

The Panamanian ambassador to the United States, Lawrence Chewling Fabrega, condemned the bombing of the plane "and spoke of the loss of life, particularly the number of Jewish casualties," said Eisenberg.

The Panamanian explosion is "now being mentioned as part of a package of terrorist attacks that occurred in the last three weeks," Eisenberg said, referring to attacks on Jewish targets in Buenos Aires, in which about 100 people were killed, and London, in which about 18 were injured.

Argentinian clues point to Iranian explosives experts

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUENOS AIRES — Ariel Mitzcaner was upset.

"I'm Jewish. I have nothing to do with the bomb. Every month my father went to the AMIA to pay the installments for my grandmother's burial," he said, referring to the Jewish social service agency housed in the Jewish community headquarters leveled July 18 by a terrorist car bomb.

The investigators were left puzzled. Their theory that Mitzcaner's garage was where explosives had been placed in the Renault van used in the bomb attack, had collapsed.

Investigators are confident that a man with false documents brought the van to be fixed at Mitzcaner's garage. But nobody knows who the man was. The only description investigators had was that the man was Argentine, little over 5 feet tall and had dark skin.

He left only one clue — a false identification with the name Ramon Martinez.

Argentine police have so far detained five people in connection with the bombing that killed 100 people and left more than 200 wounded.

All the suspects have some connection with the van, which changed hands several times before the attack. Two of the five suspects stole the vehicle, but sold it before the bombing.

In the opinion of Judge Juan Jose Galeano, who is spearheading the investigation here, there is one suspect who is the key to breaking the case: a man who stationed the van in a parking lot some 250 metres from the community headquarters.

Hezbollah

He left the Renault in the lot on July 15, and three days later, another person drove the van to the front door of the AMIA, got out on the sidewalk and detonated the explosives.

Galeano has not yet been able to prove that the man who left the van at the parking lot knew about the explosives in the vehicle.

But one clue in the investigation was provided by Monousheh Moatamer, an Iranian refugee who is in Caracas, Venezuela, under the protection of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees.

Moatamer apparently held a high position in the Iranian secret services before fleeing from Teheran a month ago.

At police headquarters in Caracas, Galeano recently showed Moatamer some 20 photographs of Iranians suspected of having taken part in the attack.

Moatamer picked out four, saying, "Find out if these people have been in Buenos Aires recently. They are explosive experts, and if they were in Buenos Aires, they surely had some participation in the attack."

The judge confirmed that the four men to whom Moatamer referred entered Argentina at Ezeiza International Airport, but left the country via the Brazilian border.

A source close to the investigation pointed out that the four men had diplomatic passports, but that only one had been a member of the Iranian Embassy in Buenos Aires.

According to Moatamer, these men were in charge of organizing local cells of the Islamic fundamentalist Hezbollah movement and provided the terrorists with backing at the time of the attack.

In the corridors of the headquarters of the Argentine government, known as Pink House, it has been rumored that the Foreign Affairs Ministry was about to expel the Iranian ambassador and break off relations with Teheran.

But the break in relations has not yet occurred, and it remains to be seen whether Moatamer's statements will help advance the investigation.

Claimants allege state discrimination

"That kind of statement was extremely irresponsible," said Sharansky, who maintains that it was one of many such declarations made in the heat of the last election campaign when politicians were vying desperately for immigrant votes.

In addition to general allegations concerning Israel's "discriminatory nature," the applications include specific stories of discrimination, most of them claiming that the immigrant was either sexually harassed or unable to get or maintain a job, or encountered difficulty in getting permission to marry in Israel — all as a result of their non-Jewish background or that of their spouse.

Some applications also alleged that children of such mixed marriages were taunted and beaten up at school, forcing the family to move out of the neighborhood.

But Cotler said he rejected the claim that these experiences are examples of state-sanctioned persecution and will make that argument when he appears before the Refugee Board this month.

"While some Russian immigrant families may have suffered discrimination in Israel, their experience is not part of a pattern of state-sanctioned persecution," he said.

"One need only look at Israel's overall immigration policy to see that," he added noting that Israel had opened its doors to nearly half a million refugees from the former Soviet Union, providing all of them with "a generous basket of benefits and support services."

Moreover, there are numerous mechanisms in Israeli society that are available to those with grievances, said Cotler, citing Israel's independent judicial system, free press, and the office of the State Controller.

"While the process may be imperfect and the remedy not always adequate, one cannot say that these applicants have a well-founded fear of persecution were they to be returned to Israel," he said.

The hearing — organized long before an Israeli complaint was lodged — was initiated by members of the Board itself who were disturbed by the discrepancy in the rate of acceptance of claims between Ontario and Quebec.

A far greater percentage of Israeli citizens applying to the Quebec Board has been granted refugee status than that in Ontario — even though the type of allegations raised in both provinces was virtually identical.

"This aroused concern among members of the Board who felt that people might be obtaining refugee status on the basis of ill-founded allegations," said Cotler.

"More and more applicants are now applying to Quebec, rather than Ontario, because they realize they have a better chance of getting accepted by the Quebec Board," said Cotler.

"It's becoming a bit of a scam operation that begins in the Commonwealth of Independent States," he charged. "People are advised that if they want to be accepted as refugees in Canada, they shouldn't apply directly from the C.I.S."

All of the approximately 60 members of the Quebec Refugee Board, as well as several representatives from Ottawa, are expected to attend the August 19 hearing.

Israel protests refugee policy

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — The Israeli Foreign Ministry has lodged an official protest with the Canadian government over its policy of granting refugee status to Israeli citizens.

Eitan Tsur, acting director-general of the Foreign Ministry, last week called in Canadian Ambassador to Israel Norman Spector to express Israel's resentment and regret over Canada's policy, which has enabled about 300 Israeli citizens, nearly all of them immigrants from the former Soviet Union, to enter Canada as political refugees. Most of the applicants charged that as non-Jews they faced discrimination in Israel.

During the meeting, Tsur pointed out that the Israeli Declaration of Independence guarantees equal rights to all citizens irrespective of race, religion or sex. Spector defended Canada's overall refugee policy, but said he would inquire about its application with regard to Israeli citizens.

The meeting came a few days after Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin lashed out at Canada for accepting Israeli citizens as political refugees, calling the policy "absurd."

In an interview with the Israeli daily Ha'Aretz, Beilin also vowed to wage a campaign to "expose the absurdity of the claims" which alleged that Israel discriminates against non-Jews.

Other Israeli officials, including Jewish Agency Chairman Yehiel Leket and immigrant activist Natan Sharansky also expressed shock and outrage over the Canadian policy.

But Canadian immigration minister Sergio Marchi rejected Beilin's criticism, saying it was inappropriate for another government to dictate to Canada what its refugee policy should be.

"We don't want to intervene in Canadian refugee affairs," said Oren David, head of the Israeli Foreign Ministry's Canada desk. "But this is a matter involving Israeli citizens, not Canadian ones. We feel we have a right to involve ourselves because as new immigrants, these people were given many benefits by the Israeli government that most other Israeli citizens don't enjoy."

David called the claims made by many of the applicants "ridiculous." He cited several examples, including that of a family of immigrants who claimed they were persecuted by members of their secular kibbutz because they refused to pray in synagogue every morning.

"Anyone who knows the first thing about Israel's secular kibbutzim can see the absurdity of such a claim," he said.

David acknowledged that some of the applicants may have experienced real discrimination in Israel. "But that happens to immigrants in many countries," he said. "Why haven't we heard of a case in which Canada granted refuge to Hispanic or Afro-American immigrants from the United States on the basis of alleged racism?"

"There is no precedent for one democratic country granting refugee status to so many citizens of another democratic country," charged Natan Sharansky, head of the Zionist Forum, Israel's main lobby group for immigrants from the former Soviet Union.

"Neither this government, nor the former one, has done enough to solve the problems of housing and employment for immigrants. But to use that as a justification for claiming that Israel is not a democracy — and as a basis for applying for refugee status — is ridiculous," he said.

However, Sharansky added, the phenomenon is marginal. "We're talking about a minority among a minority. Out of nearly half a million immigrants over the last few years, only two per cent have left Israel, and out of those only a few hundred have applied to Canada for refugee status," he said.

"Some of them used Israel as a stepping stone to go to Canada. To get into Israel they claimed they were Jewish, and to get out they claimed they weren't Jewish."

Sharansky also charged that applying for refugee status in Canada has become "a big business," with advertisements filling Russian-language papers.

Many of the women refugee applicants alleged that they had been sexually harassed or assaulted in Israel, and that their complaints had been ignored or even mocked by the police.

Alice Shalvi, head of the Israel Women's Network, the country's main women's lobby group, acknowledged that sexual harassment is widespread among women from the former Soviet Union.

"They are vulnerable because they have few sources of income and are often heads of single parent families," she said.

However, Shalvi noted that there are many avenues by which victims of sexual assaualt can seek redress, including free legal advice provided by the Network, and an organization called TENA that defends the rights of female immigrants.

"There is sexual harassment in every country," said Shalvi. "I am a bit appalled at this great and selfish exploitation of the problem. I'm sure it could have been dealt with here."

Waldheim knighthood shocks Israel

Jewish Telegraphic Agency and Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

TEL AVIV — Israel's Foreign Ministry last week instructed its ambassador to the Vatican, Shmuel Hadas, to ask the Holy See for a clarification of reports that it awarded a papal knighthood to former Austrian president Kurt Waldheim.

In a July 6 ceremony in Vienna, Waldheim was made a member of the Ordine Piano, an order of knights named directly by the Pope. The order was bestowed by the Vatican's ambassador to Austria.

Waldheim, the former president of Austria and secretary-general of the United Nations from 1972 to 1981, was the centre of a global controversy that erupted when it was learned he had covered up his Nazi past.

Waldheim was a Nazi intelligence officer stationed in the Balkans during World War II. He has been implicated in the deportations of Jews and reprisal killings of anti-Nazi partisans in the region.

Foreign Ministry Spokesman Rafi Gamzu said Israel was "shocked" by the papal award.

"If it happened, then it is a bad, tasteless joke," Gamzu said. "Whoever honors Waldheim for safeguarding human rights ignores his wartime record, which his UN term does not compensate for."

Kurt Waldheim met Pope John Paul II in 1987.

In 1987, Waldheim was barred from visiting the United States because of his wartime activities. In June 1987, Pope John Paul II became the only Western leader to receive Waldheim as a head of state. Waldheim has been largely ostracized by the rest of the Western world.

The papal award was reportedly given in recognition of Waldheim's "efforts for peace" and humanitarian activities during his term as UN secretary-general.

Peace process accentuates Rabin/Peres feud

By DAVID LANDAU
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

The Mideast peace process, wrote one leading commentator in an Israeli newspaper last week, does not include the war between Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and Foreign Minister Shimon Peres.

Following their latest bout of ire and muttered recriminations — which were played out during the historic Israeli-Jordanian summit in Washington last month — the two men met privately in Jerusalem in an effort to resolve their differences.

After two hours of discussions — at which only one mutual friend, attorney Giora Eini, was present — the two inveterate allies and foes proclaimed a renewed "working relationship."

But it was not entirely clear what was contained in the "small print" of their let's-not-squabble-in-public pact.

Their aides claimed they had hammered out an agreement demarcating their various areas of responsibility in the peace process and that it contained a pledge to cooperate fully and to conceal nothing from each another.

But in the words of the media wag cited above, whatever the details, this latest agreement can only restore a state of non-belligerency between the two men. Full peace and normalization in the Rabin-Peres relationship seem as remote and unreachable a goal as ever.

Peres was reported to be deeply offended at being virtually sidelined by Rabin during the two days of ceremonies in Washington, where Rabin and King Hussein signed the Washington Declaration, officially bringing to an end their countries' 46-year state of hostilities.

The Rabin-Peres tensions were only the latest display of a well-known and long-standing rivalry between the two.

The incident was triggered when Rabin apparently waited until the last moment to invite Peres to Washington. The invitation reportedly only came after Rabin aides leaked rumors Peres was not going to be included at all.

The slight was magnified by Peres' highly visible role in negotiations with the Jordanians only days earlier, when Peres, U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher and Jordanian Prime Minister Abdul Salam al-Majali held a three-way session. The July 20 meeting marked the first time that an Israeli official publicly set foot on Jordanian soil.

Peres' glum disposition throughout the Washington summit was a constant subject of media attention and speculation in Israel.

During the Washington trip, Rabin, in conversations and briefings, reportedly belittled Peres' contribution to the diplomatic breakthrough with Jordan.

In his public addresses, Rabin barely mentioned the foreign minister, who is widely regarded as the main architect of the government's peace initiatives.

Peres was so hurt that at one stage he apparently told his confidants he was considering resigning.

According to some reports here, during the meeting with Peres, Rabin offered a faint expression of regret for having publicly and repeatedly belittled Peres during the Washington trip. "I didn't mean to hurt you," the prime minister was quoted as saying.

According to columnist Yoel Markus of the Hebrew daily Ha'aretz, the explanation for their tensions is to be sought wholly in the realm of politics.

In Markus' view, this latest eruption of their two-decades-old hostility signals "the first round of the 1996 election build-up."

Markus noted Rabin's aside to President Clinton during the Washington trip that both of them would be facing re-election in 1996. This was believed to be the first time the Israeli prime minister publicly confirmed that he intends to run again.

Peres, who served as prime minister for only two years, 1984-1986 — presiding over a gridlocked unity government — pointedly declined to field a question on his own possible prime ministerial ambitions during a recent television interview.

He merely noted that Rabin had been elected for the present term and that he fully supported the prime minister in their peace-making odyssey.

Peres and Rabin first fought over the leadership of the Labor party in 1974, when Rabin won by a narrow margin. They have revived the rivalry every few years since then. With no especially strong challenge evident from Labor's next generation, the two septuagenarians may have yet another go at it come primary time before the 1996 election.

According to this interpretation, it was solely political considerations that led Rabin to seek all the credit for the Jordanian breakthrough and to deny Peres any part of the success.

Bitterness and openness in Gaza

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

GAZA — In the birthplace of the intifada, no distinction is made between Jew and Israeli, between soldier and civilian.

When the CJN reporter takes a photograph of some teenage boys waving a Palestinian flag, they don't smile. After years under Israeli rule, they are suspicious of every foreigner. "Where are you from?" one shouts angrily in Arabic.

During a street interview, an old man listens silently, frowning. After hearing young men talk about peace and co-existence and an end to the occupation, he barks: "I want my home back. My home in Majdal. It is now Ashkelon. I am 70 years old and I want my home back. Alright?"

He repeats the "alright" over and over again in Hebrew. His tone is bitter, almost accusatory. "B'seder? B'seder? Can you give me my home back?"

And yet in the midst of a place that is seething with hatred, there are small signs of hope. One Palestinian, who has been communicating with this journalist through an Arabic-English translator, suddenly stops and says: "Maybe you speak Hebrew? It would be so much easier to speak directly in Hebrew." He then continues the conversation in Hebrew, taking pride in his rich vocabulary, which includes the occasional Biblical reference.

"I have learned a lot from Israelis," he says. "Especially about democracy and free speech. I hope we Palestinians can apply some of what we have learned from you Israelis now that we are in charge of our own affairs."

And then there are the children.

Many have already been taught to hate everything to do with Israel. But among the tens of thousands who gathered last month in the Gaza City square to welcome Yasser Arafat are a group of five little girls. They are clad in frilly, lace-trimmed dresses — the kind of outfit that is reserved for only the most special occasions.

I tell them that they look hilwe (beautiful in Arabic), and crouch to take their picture. They panic and within seconds have run away, each in a different direction. But a few minutes later they return, curious about the stranger. They giggle, point, whisper to each other, and finally blurt out "Israel!" They look like frightened deer, ready to dart off again at the slightest threat. They have probably never seen any Jew before who wasn't a soldier.

I smile. They giggle some more. A few looks are exchanged. They consult with each other further. And soon, at their own initiative, they line up to have their picture taken. They flash a smile and, just as I am ready to snap the shot, they blurt out "Shalom! Shalom!" and continue chanting the Hebrew greeting right through Arafat's speech.

The leadership cult in America

By ARNOLD AGES

Almost everyone agrees that one of the things lacking in the last decade of the 20th century is the great leader model. In the United States, where there is a grant, it seems, for every cause, the federal government now sponsors the Dwight D. Eisenhower Leadership Development Program. Benjamin DeMott, writing in Harper's Magazine (December 1993), describes how he served on a jury judging grant applications for "leadership scholars," and in so doing discovered how far-ranging the leadership cult is.

In order to identify, train and sensitize future leaders, the American Congress, several universities (including the U.S. Military Academy), YMCAs, summer camps, business-backed leadership institutes and 4-H clubs have all embarked on a program of building new leaders for the next century.

Congress participation in the funding part of this hunt for leadership talent is not insubstantial; more than $10 million has been allotted to it, and when one factors in the contributions of universities, businesses and other educational institutions, that sum may be doubled or tripled. A rather remarkable expenditure for the development of a process with no guarantees!

DeMott suggests that the current craze for leadership skills is rooted in the 1980s' affection for books on management techniques and the technobabble it inspired. That decade foisted upon the public such words and expressions as megaskill, capstone experience, futures-creative, training design matrices and diversity training.

Some of the leadership syndrome infections, says De Mott, have infiltrated academe and learned professors now deliver papers in literature which subject the classics to the leadership template. He cites as one example "Group Dynamics and Crisis Management in For Whom The Bell Tolls [the Hemingway novel about the Spanish Civil War]."

Arnold Ages

In his review of some of the grant proposals, De Mott is appropriately sardonic as he exposes the lengths to which universities are prepared to go in order "to feed at the public trough" of government funding. Many of the grant proposals are obviously manufactured and tailored to appeal to the current trendy leadership jargon.

I thought it interesting that none of the research scenarios presented to the Eisenhower Development Program (at least among those discussed by Professor de Mott) had the wisdom to look to the past for leadership models, since they missed the man who is obviously one of the great leaders of all time. Perhaps Congress and all the other institutions involved in the current chase for leadership dollars might save their millions by having aspiring leaders read the Hebrew Bible, especially Bamidbar (Numbers) and Devarim (Deuteronomy).

In August, synagogue worshipers will be reading about the final days of Moses. They will have been exposed, in the previous 11 months, to the narratives in Shemot (Exodus) and Vayikra (Leviticus) that recount the travails of the man who led the Israelites out of Egypt.

Despite insurrection and mutiny, despite caterwauling and complaint from the Israelites whom he brought out of slavery, Moses took the talent which he had inherited from his Levite forbears and transformed himself into nuturing father, general, judge, priest, builder, and Lawgiver.

Moses read no brochures on leadership principles, but he instinctively knew when to seek advice (from Jethro, his father-in-law); when to be firm (with Korah and his followers), and when to show flexibility (with the daughters of Zelaphchad). He also supported the principle of the division of powers. He left to his brother, Aaron, and his sons, the privilege of entering the desert sanctuary.

Moses was not a perfect man; he was a flesh and blood leader who had weaknesses and faults. He also sinned and for this was denied entrance into the Promised land. While his leadership talents before the episode at the rock (which he struck to draw water from it instead of speaking to it), were truly remarkable, it was after this event that the quality of the man could really be apprehended.

The Torah describes Moses himself being graciously involved in the investiture of his successor, Joshua, and chronicles Moses' visits, to the various tribal units to ask their cooperation in supporting the man who will take the Israelites into Canaan.

There is regret, of course, in Moses's heart as he records the effort he made to persuade the Almighty to change His decree barring him from the Land. But Moses overcomes his regret in the interest of the larger Israelite community and goes out of his way to smooth the transfer of power to Joshua.

How many CEOs today could exhibit Moses' grace under similar circumstances?

Heinrich Heine once thought that Moses fared badly in comparison with the Egyptian pharaohs because their skilful architects designed and built monuments of epic grandeur, against which Israelite accomplishments appeared paltry.

Heine changed his mind later about Moses because he realized that Egyptian architects were inferior: they raised pyramids and obelisks of stone while Moses, one of the greatest architects and leaders of all time, built his monument in flesh and blood — the Jewish people! The Egyptians who built the pyramids are no longer around but Moses' creation is very much so.

That's a leadership record which few could match.

Boycott out of date

The peace process in the Middle East is well under way, but the Arab economic boycott of Israel remains stubbornly in place.

Since last September, when Israel and the PLO shocked the world with their Declaration of Principles, there have been a series of remarkable developments in the region, capped by King Hussein's courageous and wise decision last month to end Jordan's state of war with Israel.

But in spite of these presentiments of real peace, Saudi Arabia and Kuwait have not abided by their pledges to stop boycotting foreign companies that do business with Israel, while the Arab League refuses to deal with the issue constructively.

In a report released recently, the U.S. Commerce Department concluded that progress incombatting the boycott has been "disappointingly slow." Indeed, there has been a sharp increase in the practice, according to Washington.

Last month, the world's major industrial powers — the so-called G-7 nations — issued a communique calling on the Arab League to rescind the boycott. It was a timely resolution, but unfortunately, it has fallen on deaf ears.

It seems as if the Arab states are so accustomed to conflict with Israel that they cannot recognize that times have changed. After more than four decades, the Arab-Israeli conflict is finally winding down. Yet Arab leaders, their eyes closed to reality, remain mired in old, tired dogmas which collide with the increasingly universal principle of free, unfettered trade.

The abolition of the boycott would send a powerful and convincing signal to the Israeli people that the Arabs are unambiguously serious about achieving peace. It might even have a salutary influence on some Israeli politicians who, for one reason or another, fear the prospect of a just and lasting peace agreement.

The Arabs need not be afraid of free trade. It can — and probably will — benefit everyone. When will they learn that the boycott is an anachronism in an area inching ever so forward toward the promised land of peace?

A daring scenario

It has been said that there is no greater pain than the pain inflicted by a new idea.

This maxim seems to be reflected in the violent criticism made recently of a daring new scenario for Israel-Diaspora relations proposed by Yossi Beilin in Jerusalem during a conference of world Jewish leaders at the end of June.

Beilin, who is the deputy foreign minister of Israel and a man who helped shape the current Israel-PLO accord, alienated even his own prime minister with the temerity of his suggestions. ("Rubbish," said Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin).

The Board of Governors of the Jewish Agency characterized Beilin's proposal as "based on ignorance," while the chairman of the World Zionist Organization dismissed his ideas as "not serious." Beilin was accused of creating "confusion and embarrassment."

These strong reactions are understandable, given Beilin's suggestions that both the Jewish Agency and the World Zionist Organization be scrapped and replaced by a new international Jewish body to be called Beit Yisrael.

In the Beilin vision the function of the democratically elected Beit Yisrael would be to fund visits to Israel by all Diaspora youth at age 17, to support aliyah and Diaspora Jewish education. Beilin also calls for a complete census of all Diaspora Jews and an outreach program for unaffiliated Jews.

Beilin estimates the cost of the projected program at $200 million, which he sees financed by membership fees and the cooperation of the federations, the United Jewish Appeal, Keren Hayesod and private foundations. Israel Bonds, he also suggested, should be converted into a worldwide investment fund for Israel.

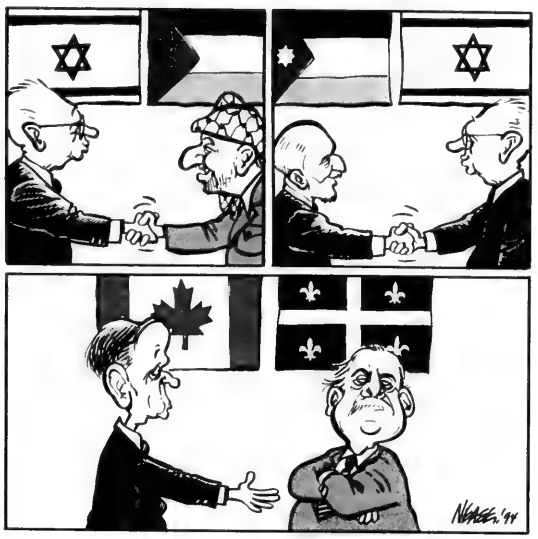
Beilin's ideas are, of course, outrageous (like Herzl's) but some times the airing of outrageous ideas is the only way to get a hearing for reformist ones. The calm, measured approach is generally met with indifference. It is obvious that no one at the Jerusalem conference was indifferent to Beilin's message.

Whatever the practicality of Beilin's message, he has touched some raw nerves and has spoken the truth, as he sees it, about the sclerosis of two organizations which represent Israeli-Diaspora relations.

Yossi Beilin may not have the right answer but he has opened the debate on a note of both scepticism and hope.

Letters to the Editor

Letters are welcome if they are brief, in English or French, typewritten with lines double spaced, and of interest to our reading public. Readers are cautioned not to make sweeping claims against persons or institutions which they cannot verify, as libel laws are very stringent. We reserve the right to edit and condense letters, which must bear the sender's address, phone number and both handwritten and typed signatures.



DEVELOP SINAI

Anyone who had taken an interest in Palestinian and Israeli history since 1948 should have some sympathy for Palestinian refugees who will return to a homeland which has changed, as pointed out by Abraham Rabinovich of the Jerusalem Post foreign service.

A very good, common sense solution of mutual benefit to Palestinians, Israelis and Egyptians should be for Egypt to invite a joint Israeli-PLO development of Sinai Peninsula.

We all know the Israelis, after taking over the Sinai in 1967, proved it to be excellent for flood-agriculture and did much to make Sinai a green land around their former settlements. A thriving tourist industry was started on the Red Sea before the Sinai was returned to Egypt.

An obvious agreement should be to try and invite small autonomous governed communities of Palestinian, Israeli and Egyptian co-operative settlements to have a fair share of its potential agriculture and tourism industries.

CLUB SAVOY

I have been out of town and have just been catching up on my reading. The Canadian Jewish News is a must in our household and therefore I am now just getting caught up to the July 7 issue.

Your newspaper always contains very interesting articles dealing with both the international and local scene as far as Jewish life is concerned.

Having been one of the founding members of Club Savoy, I read and reread the article printed on page 29 of the July 7 issue, which was so well written by Miriam Chinsky.

Of course, the memory of Sam Nichols, Jack Spiegel and Sammy Quinter brought tears to my eyes and at our reunion, all our hearts were touched by their heroism.

With respect, however, I must ask you to help me complete the Savoy Saga by informing you that in addition to names mentioned in the article, five more members were present at the reunion: Phil Greenspan, Henry Ross, Joe Chinsky, Ed Cutler and Murray Shapiro. David Green, Arron Clairman, Ed Machtinger and Lew Speigel could not attend for personal reasons.

I believe that with these names you have a complete picture of the club that really started the idea of having many clubs of young men, and ulitmately of young women, meet and work out of the old YMHA. They ultimately became members of the YMHA as young adults and later in life, many of them took senior positions in the Y's successor organization, the Jewish Community Centre.

A PROUD JEW

I wish to publicly extend a hearty mazel tov to my good friend Arthur Tannenbaum who was recently sworn in as a justice of the peace at an impressive Provincial Court ceremony.

Justice Tannenbaum was sworn into his office wearing his kippah and holding a chumash and in so doing, displayed much dignity and Kiddush Hashem (sanctification of G-d's name) on behalf of the entire Jewish community.

May his service to our country and Jewish community inspire us all to greater efforts and may Arthur and his wife Bea be blessed with long life and good health.

SERPA PINTO II

(The CJN, June 16). I was one of the passengers on the Serpa Pinto which sailed from Lisbon in 1944.

There were two crossings, one in April and one in June. It was the June crossing which was so filled with trauma! We were attacked by a German submarine, although we had been given permission to make the voyage. They forced us to evacuate the ship in 15 minutes. They ordered all the passengers to jump into the few small lifeboats which were available.

These rowboats, built to carry eight or nine people, were overloaded with 20 or more and were quickly filling up with water due to the excessive weight. We were in grave danger of sinking in the choppy Atlantic Ocean.

Although I was a mere child of 5, I will never forget the chaotic scene — women crying and screaming, people pushing and grabbing life preservers, their children, their dogs, all jumping into bobbing old rowboats!

We were ordered to stay in them all night, while the officers of the submarine searched the ship.

The scene of these rowboats, overflowing with people, women crying, certain that we were going to perish, men praying, reciting the Shema, the crew feverishly trying to bail out the water to keep the boat from sinking; this scene is indelibly etched in my brain.

Finally they took two passengers away, and disappeared into the dark waters of the ocean, with strict orders for us to return to the ship but to stay on deck until dawn.

I can still remember people huddling with their families, praying with gratitude that our lives had been spared. Unfortunately this was not the case for one of my parents' friends, who walked around the deck holding her baby girl's little white shoes crying, "Where is my Betty?" Her little girl had drowned.

When we reached America, the press was there to get the story. We were warmly welcomed in Montreal by the Jewish Immigrant Aid Society and placed in homes of people who wanted to rent out part of their house for financial reasons. We lived with an old widow on St. Urbain Street for seven years. My sister, who was born one year later, also lived in the double parlour of this house.

Even though we had very little in those years, we were happy to be given the opportunity of living in this wonderful, free country — Canada!

Since I read the article, I have communicated with fellow passengers. A reunion is being planned to take place in Montreal in September.

A NEW ARAFAT?

The protests and the unrest in Israel that followed Yasser Arafat's visits to Gaza and Jericho are both understandable and yet regrettable. It is unrealistic to expect Israelis to forgive and forget the atrocities committed against Jews by Mr. Arafat's followers.

Nonetheless Israelis must accept the judgment of their leaders in reaching an accommodation so that the avenues to peace are opened. To do otherwise would generate a return to unbridled terrorism with the usual consequences of death and destruction.

While all is not well in the former Soviet Union, western leaders welcomed initiatives from Mikhail Gorbachev who, while no Yasser Arafat, came from a background of totalitarianism, anti-Semitism and the brutal suppression of millions. His reconstruction has generally accrued to the benefit of all with a perceptible thaw in the cold war.

Hopefully a similar transformation in Yasser Arafat will ultimately lead to some mutual understanding that will grow into an acceptance of one another by the Israelis, the Palestinians and the other citizens of the Middle East.

How Peru gots its Jewish prime minister

By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

I was searching the newspapers for some items that did not involve destruction, mayhem, or other disagreeable events. No wonder therefore that I was attracted to a little article in the Jewish Post and Opinion which read: "Peru's Prime Minister has no background in politics."

The article informs the reader that Peru has a new prime minister, Ephraim Goldenberg. The real power in the country is wielded by President Alberto Fujimori, a man of Japanese background. He needed a new prime minister and asked a friend what he would do if he were sitting in the president's chair. Said the friend, "Try my partner."

The partner turned out to be Ephraim Goldenberg, who had no experience in government or foreign affairs, and whose international experience has been confined to making vacation trips to the United States or visiting his daughter in England.

Rabbi Plaut

With these credential it was a cinch to be named foreign minister, and now Goldenberg has been promoted to prime minister, retaining his other portfolio as well.

The article goes on to say that when he was sworn in for his office he refused to kneel, because it would have been in front of a crucifix. I don't know about his own involvement with the Jewish community, but his father, who is in his 94th year, has twice been president of Peru's Jewish community. The new prime minister says there is no anti-Semitism in the country and points out that not only the president but also the chairman of Congress are of Japanese origin.

Here is an added note: Goldenberg wonders why he received congratulatory notes from all over the world, including from British Prime Minister John Major, but not a letter from Israel's prime minister.

All of which gives me a good excuse to have a look at the history of Peru's Jewish community. It had a very inauspicious beginning, because the Inquisition came along with the conquistadores and prosecuted a number of new settlers who were suspected of "Judaising," that is, of returning to Judaism. In 1639, 12 suspected Jews were burned at the stake in Lima.

Today the country has about 3,300 Jews whose ancestors began arriving in the 19th century. They were attracted by the boom in rubber and their numbers swelled considerably with the influx of Sephardim from North Africa and, after World War I, from Syria and Turkey. The Nazi persecutions in Europe brought additional immigrants, but when the war was over many left the country.

There are three small synagogue communities, the largest being the Union Israelita, another frequented by Jews of German origin, and the third a Sephardi shul. All have rabbis and their own chevra kadisha, but use a common cemetery.

The country was amongst the supporters of the 1947 UN Resolution on the partition of Palestine, and ever since its relationship with Israel has been very good.

I have not been able to obtain up-to-date information on Peruvian Jews, and perhaps one of my readers will let me know the latest developments and population figures.

Jews must continue reaching out to blacks

By RABBI DOW MARMUR

Jews can never quite escape the biblical precept "You shall be unto Me a kingdom of priests and a holy nation." Even the secularists among us like to see themselves as having a priestly role in the open society. As heirs of the Hebrew prophets, we have been in the forefront of the struggle for civil rights, and social action still figures prominently on our Jewish agenda.

But that's not the way others see us. It is particularly painful that blacks view Jews as part of their problem rather than as part of the solution. This was amply demonstrated at a two-day symposium on Race and the City held in May in Toronto, co-sponsored by the Department of Philosophy of the University of Toronto and Holy Blossom Temple, and funded by Sandra and Joe Rotman.

A fascinating public lecture by a young black philosopher, Charles Mills, and an intense session on black-Jewish relations showed that blacks perceive Jews as part of the white majority — albeit somewhat "off-white" — and, therefore, as guilty as the other whites of oppressing blacks. Perhaps even more guilty.

Why more? Several explanations were offered: the Christian upbringing of many blacks and the anti-Semitism contained in Christian teachings; the identification with oppressed Palestinians, especially among blacks who have embraced Islam; the memory of Jewish landlords of slum properties occupied by blacks; and most important, plain envy that the Jews have made it and blacks have not.

That is probably behind the black anti-Semitism in evidence during last year's debate over Show Boat. Most blacks in Toronto, it seems, feel Jews should have been more vociferous in trying to stop the production. They are sore, especially because Jews are involved in it. They are also dismayed that Jewish leaders have not come out in solidarity with the black protesters, and they perceive this to be a manifestation of Jewish hostility.

Jews, on the other hand, feel that emancipation — which has given us a place in society as a result of our own efforts, not because of WASP magnanimity — obligates us to champion the cause of artistic freedom, and that people should be allowed to make up their own minds about this musical, or anything else.

Moreover, Jews perceive black indignation over Show Boat to be an excuse for giving vent to the anti-Semitism that had been there all along. Jews are angry that responsible black leaders failed to repudiate anti-Semitism, and to respond to overtures made by Jewish organizations. They are dismayed that individual Jews should have been singled out as targets.

Jews have good reason to question black intentions. Thus, when the Reform movement spoke out in solidarity with blacks against Show Boat, it got a lot of flack from Jews while the black community largely ignored the gesture. Similarly, my own attempts to establish contact with black organizations in the city have often been abortive. There is cause for suspicion that black leaders deliberately cold-shoulder Jews.

Some may be relieved that this is the case. Though Jews may have been cajoled by activists into exercising their priestly role by seeking to help blacks, they may now welcome the excuse that their overtures are not welcome. Because Jews have made it, many may have been moved by tradition and conscience to reach out to the new "strangers" — the new Jews: the blacks — but they may also have been relieved that black anti-Semitism thwarted their efforts.

For the virus of racism has also affected some Jews. The leaders of the Jewish community would have contained it, had they been encouraged or at least not actively discouraged, by blacks. That opportunity seems to be lost, at least for the time being.

It appears some, or many, black leaders may have an interest in remaining victims, in the same way as some Jews want to style themselves as victims, denying the power and influence we now have. Perhaps Jews and blacks are even competing for "victimhood," each saying that because they are victims, they can neither harbor prejudice nor tolerate other victims.

So where do we go from here? First a personal explanation: I am not a social activist because it is expedient. In fact, the opposite is the case. Social activists are nowadays suspect in the Jewish community; I cannot think of an effort on behalf of blacks in which the congregation I serve has been involved that has not caused us reproof by fellow Jews.

Because I am not a social activist for reasons of expediency, I have no problem in continuing to affirm our duty to stand up for blacks, even though I may be shunned or ridiculed for it. For I am acting out of my own religious commitment, and not for political reasons. I am even prepared to see the obstacles as a test of my liberal convictions. Therefore, I will not be demoralized by rebuffs, even when I am hurt by them.

Even if all the projects in black-Jewish cooperation in which I am still involved fail, as they may do, I will seek fresh opportunities for dialogue. God's commandment to affirm the stranger in our midst, as understood by God's creatures, has to be articulated, irrespective of the rating it receives. We have to be constantly reminded of our duty lest we slide into mindless racism in the guise of indignation against black anti-Semitism, or into a high-minded fight for freedom of speech because it is someone else who is spoken about.

Priests have always made sacrifices. Those of us who today, as practising Jews, seek to emulate the priests of old, will have to make sacrifices not by offering animals on the altar but by foregoing a little, or much, of our dignity. We may also have to make sacrifices by setting aside our private interests and our personal ambitions in the struggle for dignity and equality to all, even to those who, for spurious and unjust reasons, don't like us.

Rabbi Dow Marmur is the senior rabbi of the Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto.

Get me a date: Rosh Hashanah already?

By ERICA MEYER RAUZIN

Who has been monkeying around with the calendar? Who did this to us? Who decreed that Rosh Hashanah should come on the very heels of summer, barely closing out the Labor Day weekend? Who decided that Yom Kippur will be done before October and Sukkot will arrive while the weather is still steamy? I would like someone to take the blame, please. Enough is enough.

The calendar of Jewish holidays is all out of whack this year, apparently as we conclude some lunar, nay, cosmic cycle that promises us all the yontifs will be back in their proper places next year. Everything is early. We are being snuck up upon, assaulted, thrown into a time warp of unfair proportions.

Slow down. I am not ready for the New Year. I am barely accustomed to the old one. How can we don our new fall clothes when September is so new? How can it be time to dip apples in honey when the apples aren't yet fall-crisp and the weather is still as sticky as the honey.

Someone has messed up the proper order of events. My internal clock, my lifelong inner barometer of the way the Judaic calendar meshes with the ordinary, daily January-to-December routine, is having a rough ride. I'm seeing an early fall, an early winter and an impossible spring.

Erica Meyer Rauzin

And if you think September is bad, get ready: Chanukah starts the last Sunday in November. That's the last night of the U.S. Thanksgiving weekend! Turkeys and menorahs . . . it just doesn't go.

It is, as usual, not easy being Jewish. I have a series of expectations about Rosh Hashanah which are not being met. I expect it to come after the children are well settled in school, not after they have been in classes five or six days. I expect it to come when the air is crisp, when the mountain leaves have begun to exhibit a scarlet tinge, when the new TV series are previewed. I do not expect it to be the harbinger of fall, but its guest, arriving after the house is cleaned up from summer and the routine of autumn is established.

Having an early Rosh Hashanah is like being robbed of a cusp of time, of a gradual slide from summer to the school year, of a moment of transition from the swimming pool to the football season.

Rosh Hashanah is the new year, and it should mark beginnings — the start of winter, not the last lag of summertime. Ah, where is October when you need it?

I'm sure all these complaints indicate that I am insufficiently spiritual, unable to grasp the philosophical significance of the lunar calendar with its ancient rhythms and crossword puzzle months. Perhaps so, but it seems to me that part of the role of religious holidays is to anchor us in time, to give us landmarks in the passage of the days and weeks and months. I, for one, do not adjust easily to having my landmarks yanked about. Fall holidays belong in the fall; winter holidays should not intrude upon autumn, and spring holidays should wait until after the daffodils and jonquils bloom.

I'm sure I'll get use to this.

I can adjust, I know. I'll find the right clothes and the right menu and maybe even the right attitude.

I bet I can do it, at least for Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur and Sukkot and Simchat Torah. I might even be able to cope with Chanukah at turkey time; just let me figure out if you can stuff a bird with latkes.

But, please, straighten this out before spring. I've looked at my 1994 calendar. I've accepted the topsy-turvey timing. But I haven't dared peek at 1995. If I'm going to have to confront Passover cleaning in March, or, heaven forbid, February, I don't even want to know. One thing at a time, if not in proper time.

First let us slow down summer before we bring it to an abrupt halt. Give us time to put away the tents and sleeping bags, the swim suits and kites. Let us buy the school supplies and shop for the new dresses, meet this year's teachers and replace last year's sturdy shoes. Let us clean the gutters and oil the bikes, fill the freezer and send out the New Year cards. I'll never make it to apples and honey if I don't start now.

Clearly, the only way to cope with all this earliness is to go with the flow and be early as well. So consider yourself warned: it is later than you think. Sign up for your pew, check your holiday accessories, and say hello to autumn — it's knocking at the door.

Take a deep breath and begin to refocus. Try to imagine a chill in the air. The time, right or wrong, is upon us.

Oh, before I forget, may you be inscribed for a good year in the book of Life. It's never a minute too soon for that.

German extremists pose a threat

Reporting from Berlin, Bonn and Cologne, Sheldon Kirshner looks at the radical right-wing scene in Germany.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

For all the pain and mayhem they've inflicted in the past few years, neo-Nazi bands in Germany are gradually being brought to heel by the government.

Since Germany's unification four years ago, violence-prone neo-Nazis have run amok, torching asylum-seekers' hostels, killing and wounding visible minorities and desecrating Jewish cemeteries and Holocaust memorials.

The dramatic upsurge of radical right-wing violence, which has embarrassed many Germans and sullied Germany's image abroad, was fed by a recession which is now winding down, chauvinistic nationalism which recalls Nazism, xenophobia which was stirred by the influx of hundreds of thousands of foreigners into the country, and a blatant type of anti-Semitism with which Germans are depressingly familiar.

The violence reached its peak in September 1992, with 536 incidents, and since then it has been on the wane, according to Norbert Jung, an official at the Ministry of Interior in Bonn who monitors right-wing radicalism.

The downward trend is reflected in statistics compiled by the Office for the Protection of the Constitution in Cologne.

Just under 1,500 violent right-wing extremist offences were committed in 1991. A substantial increase was registered in 1992, with 2,639 such acts. Last year, the figure was 2,232, a 15 percent decrease over 1992.

And judging by the first three months of this year, which witnessed 413 violent offences in comparison to 663 in the same period in 1993, neo-Nazi crimes are on the decline.

But Germany's battle with its neo-Nazi fringe is far from finished, according to Heinrich Sippel, whose department in the Office for the Protection of the Constitution in Cologne keeps a close watch on right-wing radicals. While they do not endanger German democracy, they nevertheless pose a threat to public security, he said.

The firebombing of a synagogue in Lubeck last March, together with the riot in the eastern German city of Magdeburg last May in which foreigners were assaulted and chased through the streets by skinheads, underline the considerable potential for far-right violence.

In response to the anguish they've foisted upon the nation, the federal government has begun to crack down on the lunatic right.

Speaking to an American Jewish Committee meeting in Washington recently, Foreign Minister Klaus Kinkel declared that Germany is addressing the problem.

But Ignatz Bubis, chair of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, has complained that all too often courts have been lenient in sentencing perpetrators of right-wing crimes. And Douglas Jones, a senior American diplomat in Germany, has said that the government "lacks the will" to confront extremism.

In levelling his unusually outspoken critique, Jones focused on a sensitive issue which is intrinsically linked to right-wing violence — immigration.

Chancellor Helmut Kohl has said repeatedly that Germany, home to nearly seven million foreigners in a population of 80 million, is not an immigrant country.

Using this as a departure point, Jones noted: "If I were a skinhead, I would take a certain amount of comfort in hearing that Germany was not a country of immigration. That would signal to me that... foreigners who live here legally do not belong here, and that I am justified in wanting them out. And to be honest with you, this sentiment is by no means limited to skinheads."

Jones was critical of Germany's citizenship laws, which place the utmost importance on German ancestry rather than on place of birth or residence. As he pointedly observed: "How can these minorities remain anything but conspicuous, underprivileged targets of anger and frustration, if they have no chance to become assimilated on an equal basis with Germans if they so choose, or to have their own cultural distinctiveness protected from attack if they do not?"

Cornelia Schmalz-Jacobsen, the government's commissioner for alien affairs, has also called for changes in the citizenship laws.

Kohl has promised a serious debate on the question after the national election on Oct. 16.

Immigration is closely connected with the flight of would-be refugees into Germany. Last year, critics took the government to task for bending to right-wing pressure by tightening up the country's liberal asylum law.

From 1980 until 1992, 1.5 million asylum seekers entered Germany, far more than any other country in Europe. Since the legislation was amended, there has been a drastic decrease in the number of foreigners requesting asylum in Germany and, with it, a drop in rightist violence.

* * *

Since the end of 1992, the government has taken a series of concerted steps to stem this plague.

These include the establishment of special police units that can be deployed at short notice; creation of a task force and a data base on right-wing extremism; stepped up raids against radicals; and the banning of four neo-Nazi organizations.

Sabine Laue, an official of the Office for the Protection of the Constitution in Berlin, said that the banned associations are the National Front, the Democratic Alternative, the German Friendship Bund and the National Offensive, with a combined membership of less than 400.

The government wants to ban the Free German Workers' party, with 2,000 to 3,000 members, and the National List, with 80 members, Laue added. These petitions are still before the courts.

Since 1980, 11 far-right associations have been outlawed. Only one extreme right-wing political party, the Socialist Reich party, led by an old Nazi, has been banned since the end of World War II.

Apart from these measures, the government has cracked down on record companies and rock bands which foment racial hatred; restricted the civil rights of two notable extremists; and launched information campaigns against intolerance.

Heinrich Sippel [Sheldon Kirshner]

What's more, judges have handed down harsher prison sentences of late. Last December, two young neo-Nazis convicted of killing three Turks in the town of Molln — one of several incidents which finally galvanized Germany into action — were sentenced to life in prison.

The verdict was regarded as a sign that the German judiciary has begun to deal with extremists decisively.

"At the beginning of this wave of violence, sentences were milder, and there were protests," said Schmalz-Jacobsen. "But in recent cases, German courts have been living up to their responsibilities."

By all accounts, about 70 percent of the suspects arrested in such cases are under the age of 21. In 1991-92, right-wing violence was more common in the eastern, former communist half of Germany. Last year, the level of violence in eastern and in western Germany was almost identical.

In absolute numbers, North Rhine-Westphalia, Germany's most populous state, headed the list of violent extremist-motivated crimes in 1993. On a per-capita basis, the state of Brandenburg topped the list.

Jung claims that less than 10 percent of the perpetrators are affiliated with a group and thus carry out their crimes as individuals.

The latest figures show that Germany is home to 81 radical right-wing groups, with 43,000 members. This includes 6,400 militants, particularly skinheads.

The far-right Republican party, with 23,000 members, is not classified as extremist, but may shortly be placed on a list of extremist organizations that are kept under regular police surveillance.

Last year, the Simon Wiesenthal Centre claimed that the neo-Nazi movement is larger than portrayed by the authorities. Sippel, however, disputes this assertion.

To the best of Jung's knowledge, there are 27 neo-Nazi groups in Germany, with a membership of 1,500. The most prominent of these are the Viking Youths, the German Citizens'Initiative, the German Nationalists and Direct Action Middle Germany. Virtually all neo-Nazi organizations are based in western Germany.

Since the AIDS-related death of Michael Kuhnen several years ago, the neo-Nazis have been without a charismatic leader, Sippel said.

Neo-Nazis, he added, are trying to build an effective underground network. Laue said that they have ties to neo-Nazis elsewhere in Europe, and that they receive much of their hate literature from Gary Lauck, an American living in Lincoln, Nebraska.

Not surprisingly, German neo-Nazis have plugged into computer technology, and as a result, they have become more effective, Laue said.

There is no evidence that neo-Nazis use training camps in the Arab world. In the early 1980s, an outfit called the Wehrsportgruppe Hoffmann had access to camps in southern Lebanon.

In terms of size, the German People's party, with 26,000 members, is reported to be the largest radical right-wing party in Germany. It is followed by the Republicans, the National Democratic party, the Free German Workers' party, the German League and the National List.

The German People's party and the Republicans advocate a strong Germany within the 1939 borders and tighter controls over foreigners.

Gerhard Frey, the leader of the German People's party, is believed to be more extreme than Franz Schonhuber, the head of the Republicans. Frey, who publishes the Deutsche Nationale Zeitung, with a circulation of about 120,000, is supposedly anti-Semitic and anti-Israel. So, too, is Schonhuber, who was a member of the Waffen-SS, Sippel said.

Neither the German People's party nor the Republicans have won seats in the Bundestag, the national parliament. And Sippel doubts whether they will in the forthcoming election.

But both parties have captured a small number of state and municipal seats in Baden-Wurttemberg, Schleswig-Holstein, Bremen and Berlin.

Schonhuber secured a place in the European Parliament in 1991, but lost it in June when the Republicans picked up only 3.9 percent of the vote, less than the 5 percent needed for representation.

Although Schonhuber denies that he is a radical, one of his former aides recently quit, charging that the party was growing increasingly extremist. Last spring, Schonhuber caused a controversy when he called Bubis "the worst rabble-rouser in Germany."

Of Germany's far-right leaders, none but Gunter Deckert of the National Democratic party has come as close to being imprisoned. Deckert, whom Sippel describes as "a faceless bureaucrat," recently received a one-year suspended sentence for promoting racial hatred and disparaging the dignity of Holocaust survivors. Deckert's activities prompted legislators to consider passage of an "Auschwitz Lie" law.

Ernst Zundel, the Toronto-based neo-Nazi propagandist, is described by Sippel as "the Canadian address" for German right-wing extremists. His leaflets, posters and videos regularly find their way to Germany, where the production and distribution of such material is outlawed.

Sippel regards Zundel as a "real professional," but is anything but impressed with the calibre of his "primitive" publications.

The Jewish World

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

William Levitt was a home builder for the ages. His family firm, Levitt & Sons, almost single-handedly created a new concept in North American housing — the affordable suburban subdivision. In the view of urban historians, the Levitts — William, his brother Alfred and their father Abraham — exerted a profound and lasting impact on the home-building industry.

Levittown, their prototype suburb in Long Island, New York, was finished in the early 1950s. Their homes appealed to middle-class Americans, invariably headed by returning veterans seeking a slice of the American dream. The Levitts built more than 17,000 almost identical — some would say boring — detached houses in Long Island. They used standarized plans and prefabricated components to bring down costs and speed up construction. These innovations enabled the Levitts to build up to 36 houses a day.

After their success in New York, they erected similar subdivisions in Pennsylvania and New Jersey. In 1968, six years after his father's death, William sold Levitt & Sons — which had been founded in 1929 — to International Telephone and Telegraph for $92 million. Due to bad investments, the Levitts lost much of their wealth in the 1970s and 1980s.

Samuel Bronston was a photograher who moved up to film production. Born in Russia and raised in France, Bronston is best known for El Cid, a three-hour 1961 epic about a legendary 11th century hero who drove the Muslims out of Spain. The film, which garnered mixed reviews, had a star-studded cast led by Charlton Heston and Sophia Loren.

In a 25-year career as a producer, Bronston was involved in such big-budget movies as 55 Days at Peking and Circus World.

Martin Kosleck was a German-born actor who portrayed Nazi nasties in a succession of 1940s Hollywood films.

In memoriam

Kosleck, who studied acting with the great Berlin stage director Max Reinhardt, left Germany soon after Hitler's accession to power. Ironically, casting directors, impressed by his aloof demeanor and his fixed stare, tapped him to play Nazi villains ranging from Hitler and Josef Goebbels (the propaganda minster) to SS officers and concentration camp guards. Kosleck appeared in Confessions of a Nazi Spy, The Hitler Gang, All Through the Night and Underground.

David Kirschenbaum was called the dean of American booksellers. He specialized in books and manuscripts written by the Founding Fathers of the United States and Abraham Lincoln, but also dealt in 20th century manuscripts. His clients were businessmen, bankers and industrialists, some of whom donated their rare collections to museums.

Born in Tarnow, Poland, Kirschenbaum and his family emigrated to the United States in 1900, when he was 5 years old. He launched his career at the age of 8, selling books from his father's pushcart, and by 15, he had his own store.

Reuben Mattus was the founder of the Haagen-Dazs ice cream empire. A Polish Jew who peddled his family's homemade ice cream for about three decades in New York City, Mattus hit upon a winning formula by coming up with a richer ice cream exuding snob appeal. He settled on a supposedly Danish name which means absolutely nothing in any language.

The product was immensely popular, prompting Mattus to open a string of franchise shops around the world. In 1983, he sold Haagen Dazs to a U.S. conglomerate, but Mattus did not retire. Two years before his death, he began marketing Mattus' Lowfat Ice Cream, hoping to capitalize on a current craze.

Josef Stroder was a German pediatrician who saved Jewish and Polish children in Krakow during the Nazi occupation. The Gestapo arrested him, but his life was saved by the collapse of Nazi Germany.

Tadeusz Pankiewicz was a Polish pharmacist who helped Jews escape from Krakow and hid Jewish religious objects during World War II. After the war, he was honored by Jewish organizations in Israel and the United States.

Jewish Agency sounds alarm over Soviet Jewry

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Jewish continuity is in grave jeopardy in the newly independent states of the former Soviet Union, and there is a limited amount of time in which to do something about it, officials of the Jewish Agency for Israel warn.

If current patterns of emigration and assimilation continue, the Jewish population in the former Soviet Union is likely to drop by nearly one million over the next five years, said Baruch Gur, director of the Jewish Agency department dealing with the newly independent states.

The Jewish population in these areas already fell by a million in the last four years, and a decrease of another million would leave only 500,000 Jews, said Gur.

Uri Gordon, head of the Agency's immigration and absorption department, was even more dramatic in his pronouncements. "If Jews won't make aliyah, they will disappear," he said flatly.

Of the half-million Jews projected to remain after five years, only 150,000 will be children of two Jewish parents, Gordon ointed out.

Currently, 100,000 to 120,000 Jews emigrate from the newly independent states each year, of which 60,000 to 70,000 come to Israel. At the same time, the rates of intermarriage run as high as 75 per cent in Russia, Gur said.

Gordon pointed to the aging population and the low birth rate, which he said are contributing to the numerical demise of the Jewish community. For every Jewish child born, between 11 and 13 Jews die, he said.

Gur and Gordon sounded the alarm as aliyah figures rose in the second quarter of 1994. According to the National Conference on Soviet Jewry in New York, 14,929 immigrants from the former Soviet republics arrived in Israel during the second quarter of this year, compared to 12,531 during the first quarter.

Another 7,331 immigrants arrived in the United States during this period under the government's refugee program, compared to 8,156 during the first quarter of 1994, according to preliminary statistics released by the Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society in New York.

Emigration from Russia and its former Soviet neighbors, though, is running slightly behind where it was at this time last year.

A total of 32,916 immigrants arrived in Israel during the first seven months of 1994, compared to 36,863 last year. And 18,026 refugees arrived in the United States so far this year, compared to 20,252 for the same period last year, according to the National Conference and HIAS.

Urgent challenge posed

The Jewish Agency expects about 60,000 to arrive from the former Soviet lands by year's end, compared with roughly 70,000 last year.

"It is our responsibility to pay attention" to the critical situation in the former Soviet Union, said Gur, adding that the Jewish continuity problem is not limited by borders.

The possibilities of assimilation are increasing as a result of some of the recent political reforms in the newly independent states, he said. In many places Jews no longer must be registered as Jewish in their passports, so "those who want to disappear can disappear."

At the same time, Jews are "coming out of the closet as Jews," but primarily for the "privilege of emigrating."

These trends, said Gur, pose an urgent challenge for the Jewish world.

"On the one hand, we have those who will assimilate, and on the other, those who will emigrate," he said. "In the middle, we have those who are staying and haven't made the decision whether to leave or to assimilate and to what degree they want to remain Jews."

The Jewish Agency has stepped up programs in light of what it sees as a "window of opportunity" to reach this population, virtually doubling its activities in key regions in basic Jewish education and in the promotion of Israel and aliyah.

"We introduce them to Judaism and to Israel," said Gur.

For example, summer camps for youth that last year served 10,000 are serving 20,000 this summer. They were doubled after a Gutman Institute survey found the camps "increased involvement in Jewish activities and increased knowledge, ties and identification with the Jewish people and the State of Israel."

"Kids who know basically nothing (Jewishly) are coming to these camps from tiny communities," where the number of Jews is minute, said Gur, who visited three of the most remote camps in Siberia last month.

At the same time, the number of ulpanim, or Hebrew language courses, in the former Soviet Union has quadrupled from 30 to 120, while the number of Jewish Agency offices increases from 22 to 31 and shlichim, or emissaries, increased from 70 to 90.

For Gordon, all Jewish Agency energy in the newly independent states is directed toward aliyah, in contrast to other organizations supporting programs to strengthen Jewish community, culture and education there.

"All efforts to build community life in the former Soviet Union will fail because there is no future for Jews."

Meanwhile, aliyah patterns have been in flux. So far this year, there has been a 20 per cent decrease in aliyah from Russia, where an estimated 750,000 Jews remain.

The decline is a result of the stabilization of the economy and the fact that the "reservoir of Jews motivated to leave has been getting smaller each year," said Chaim Chesler, head of the Jewish Agency delegation in the newly independent states.

But the Russian stabilization is "shaky," Chesler emphasized. "If an extremist president is elected in '96, the whole situation will change."

Severe economic distress

In Ukraine, where there are a half-million Jews, emigration is up this year between 50 and 60 per cent, and is expected to be at least double the 1993 figure at year's end, Chesler said.

The increase is due to Ukraine's severe economic distress and the political instability that gives rise to nationalism, said Chesler. The Jews are also less assimilated than in Russia, so "the potential immigrant pool is stronger," he said.

The pressure in Ukraine to emigrate is not expected to ease in spite of recent elections there of a new president and government which enjoy the support of the Jewish community, according to Gur.

"The prevailing sense of political and economic crisis is exacerbated in the Jewish community by the fear that without a rapid improvement in conditions, an upsurge in nationalist feelings can be expected," he said.

Meanwhile, "we are putting forth every effort" to reach those in the former Soviet Union still hesitating to make aliyah "for whatever the complicated reasons may be," said Gordon.

"Introducing aliyah opportunities to every city in the FSU, remote as it may be, linking employment and housing, and attempting to offer a direct and secure path to the undecided immigrant is our goal," he said.

"Knowing a place was waiting for me made a difference," said Olga Ostrovsky, a chemical engineer who recently made aliyah from Ukraine with her husband, also an engineer, and their 7-year-old son, after making contact with the Jewish Agency.

"We had a job in our field and had learned Hebrew in ulpan," she said. "We feel at home here."

"We could have gone anywhere, to the United States or to Germany," said her husband, "but for Jews it is better in Israel."

Not every new immigrant in Israel is as happy.

"It doesn't mean they all have a house or a car," Gordon said in an address to the recent Jewish Agency Assembly.

But he said Israel has made "great achievements," in terms of immigrant absorption. Fifty-two per cent of the new immigrants have housing and unemployment among them has dropped in the last two years from 38 per cent to 14 per cent, he said.

Death becomes way of life for Rwandan refugees

By ALON PINKAS
The Jerusalem Post

An Israeli Air Force ground crew loads a transport plane with medical supplies, destined for the refugee camps in and around Goma, Zaire. [RNS Photo/Reuters]

KIWOMBA, Zaire — Rwanda has been blessed by nature but betrayed by mankind. The failure is colossal and shameful.

Kiwomba, with its rapid accumulation of corpses, lies in a green valley about 1,500 metres above sea level. It is overshadowed by the 5,000-metre-high Karisimbi volcano and a string of other volcanic peaks almost as towering.

Around Kiwomba are lush jungles, dotted with the vibrant colors of tropical flowers.

It would be picturesque if it weren't for the ubiquitous presence of death.

Death in its blunt, unrelenting, overwhelming, arbitrary, cruel presence. Death which is everywhere but remains incomprehensibly remote. Death that leaves gaping holes in families when it doesn't destroy them entirely. Death of dignity, death of hope, death of the human spirit. Death as a way of life.

Last month, I was on the outskirts of Goma, a town of 120,000 besieged by one million dispossessed refugees on the Rwanda-Zaire border. After Kiwomba, the refugee camp and the orphanage near Goma seemed less horrendous. Because if there is such a place as Hell, if such a place can be found on a map, it is named Kiwomba.

After being there, I feel compelled to begin a report thus: "Dear reader, I don't think I have the skills to describe what I have seen. But I can begin to understand what mass death at Auschwitz might have been like."

There are approximately 350,000 Rwandan refugees in Kiwomba. A huge, amorphous crowd of people walking nowhere, doing nothing, having fled from one hell to another hell, hopeless, dehydrated, easy targets for cholera and other forms of almost certain death: a senseless horror show.

The roadsides are littered with bodies. Thousands and thousands and then more, in various degrees of decomposition. All lying in the midst of the thousands who are still alive, wandering aimlessly and helplessly. Dazed.

Food is not the problem. Disease and contaminated water are. But perhaps the most striking phenomenon is the visual similarity between the dead and living. Both have the same hollow, lifeless, empty stare. The dead, the nearly dead, the dying. The half-alive and the healthy. They sit, awaiting their turn; and they just stare at you, at the jungle, at the high mountains. They have no tears, they express no emotion, they reflect no fear.

"Welcome to the Republic of Rwanda," proclaims a sign in French on the border checkpoint between Zaire and Rwanda. This is where over a half-million Rwandan refugees came through, fleeing the horrors of civil war. They began streaming into Zaire in mid-July, once the tide in the civil war turned in favor of the minority Tutsi tribe.

The Hutu army — actually the Rwandan army — disintegrated, and more than 30,000 armed Hutus deserted and infiltrated Zaire, fearing revenge and recrimination after being responsible for an almost genocidal massacre of the Tutsis during a three-month civil war. It erupted on April 6 when the plane carrying the presidents of Rwanda and neighboring Burundi exploded in midair. Sabotage was suspected.

On the border, we meet a Tutsi officer, Second Lieutenant Peter Kanaki.

"I am not a fighter. I am an economist," he tells a group of Israeli journalists. "But I joined the Tutsi rebels when the war began."

Kanaki turns for a moment to assure a trickle of returning refugees that the war is over.

When Yossi Sarid, who is heading Israel's 77-person mission here introduces himself as the "environment minister in the Israeli cabinet," Kanaki seems impressed, although a bit dubious. He thanks Sarid for the mobile army surgical hospital Israel set up for Rwandan refugees. Sarid produces his passport to prove that he is a minister. After that is settled, and the two converse in their official capacities, we notice a pile of several hundred hand-grenades, rockets, bullets, knives, blood-stained swords and axes.

"This is what we took from the Hutu soldiers," says a Zairean captain on his side of the border.

"But the war is really over," Kanaki says. "I am a Rwandan, not a Tutsi," he smiles.

So are the children treated in the field hospital the Israel Defence Force set up there. A fully equipped MASH, it was built and operational within 24 hours after eight cargo planes discharged several hundred tons of medical equipment.

But future awaiting survivors is a different question, one that isn't asked here, where life seems so cheap, but where 15 Israeli doctors nonetheless strive to maintain the sanctity of life. They will save, or rather prolong, the lives of only a fraction of those dying.

"We will do whatever is necessary to save one life," says Brig.-Gen. Dr. Michael Weiner, chief IDF medical officer.

To some perhaps, Israel's aid makes proud of being Israeli. But in Kiwomba, one is ashamed of being human.

The devastating dimensions of the Rwandan problem are slowly affecting Zaire. Cholera, malaria, AIDS. The volatile mix of political, human, economic and health crises is frightening. It is an intractable, chaotic and uncontrollable situation.

Thousands continue to die each day while Hutu soldiers, the empty and terrible look of a devastated army reflected in their eyes, move aimlessly on the roads.

With no end in sight, death will continue to triumph in Madame Kasouku's orphanage in Goma, and in Kiwomba.

And in the middle of it all, in downtown Goma, is Lanira's steak house, where foreign journalists dine.

Even in Hell, there is a business class.

* * *

As the sounds of Shabbat prayers floated out of the makeshift synagogue set up by the Israeli medical team working at the refugee camp in Goma, Israeli doctors were operating on a new mother of twins.

The woman was suffering from a severe infection because the babies' placenta had not been removed after the birth several days before.

"She was nearly dead, like a corpse nursing a child on each withered breast, and we saved her. I cried," said Dr. Hezi Levy, an IDF surgeon.

The attempt to create a Shabbat atmosphere could not push away the smell of death that permeates the city and the camp, where the Israeli team has worked from dawn until past dusk for nearly two weeks. By week's end, the IDF team had saved at least 300 lives.

"Three hundred patients are a drop in the bucket, but even so, it's 300 people," said Lt.-Col. Shmuel Shapira.

Last Friday morning, the Zairean chief of staff visited the hospital to receive a report on its activities. The general, who had been an ambassador to Israel for five years, said, "During the tough moments, we see who our real friends are, who comes and offers assistance. I hope that this is an opening for renewing and strengthening the ties between Zaire and Israel."

Aided by interpreters, the doctors sort out the sick as they come into the hospital and send them to the different "departments." A mobile laboratory and X-ray unit aid in diagnosis.

The suffering around the soldiers takes its toll.

"Death is not something I haven't seen. But this amount of suffering seeps into our souls and we will never forget it," said Maj. Ilan Malkai, 29, the unit's medical operations officer.

* * *

JERUSALEM — Israel will maintain its medical team in Goma for approximately another two weeks. The government will decide soon whether to continue the aid beyond then.

"The Israeli activity has earned much praise from all the states in the area and from international bodies, who said they had never seen such a well-equipped field hospital set up so fast, nor such dedicated and skilled medical treatment under such conditions," reported Environment Minister Sarid last week.

It was also revealed last week that the original estimates of sending the medical team had been far too low. Estimates now range from $16 million to $20 million (U.S.).

Israel's Magen David Adom, meanwhile, is inaugurating a nationwide fundraising campaign for Rwandan refugees. The money will be used to purchase medical equipment, disinfectants for the water supply, food and other supplies.

Jewish victims of terrorism ignored in UN condemnation

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

UNITED NATIONS — Bowing to pressure from non-aligned nations, the United Nations Security Council issued a statement that condemns recent terrorist bombings but refuses to acknowledge that they were targeted at Jewish and Israeli institutions.

The statement, read by Security Council President Jamsheed Marker of Pakistan late last month, followed a meeting where Argentine Foreign Minister Guido Di Tella reported on the July 18 bombing of the Buenos Aires Jewish community centre, in which more than 100 people were killed.

The informal consultation was called by Argentina and Great Britain. Two car bombs in London last month damaged the Israeli Embassy and a Jewish fund-raising organization, injuring nearly two dozen individuals.

A draft UN statement had specifically mentioned the Israelite Association for Mutual Assistance in Buenos Aires and the Israeli Embassy in London as the targets, and expressed solidarity with the victims of the attacks.

But as approved by consensus, the final statement expressed "sympathy and condolences to the victims and their families," as well as to the people and governments of Argentina and of the United Kingdom. Jews and Israel are not mentioned.

This bowdlerization of the statement came at the behest of the non-aligned states, represented in the Security Council by Pakistan, according to UN sources.

Pakistan was criticized recently by Amnesty International for harsh and arbitrary imposition of its new Islamic blasphemy laws, which call for the death penalty.

In its statement on the recent bombings, the Security Council demanded "an immediate end to all such terrorist attacks," and stressed "the need to strengthen international cooperation in order to take full and effective measures to prevent, combat and eliminate all forms of terrorism, which affect the international community as whole."

Israeli, American and Argentine officials have accused Iran of sponsoring the terror attacks. Iran has denied involvement.

In a meeting with his Israeli counterpart, Emilio Cardenas, Argentina's ambassador to the United Nations, said that as the investigation of the July 18 attack continued, his country would seek a formal Security Council resolution condemning the blast and those responsible.

The Israeli ambassador, Gad Ya'acobi, meanwhile, expressed disappointment at "the deletion of the explicit reminder that the terror activities in Buenos Aires and in London were aimed against Jewish targets, Jewish communities, and the Embassy of Israel in London.

"This language is an escape by those who are not ready to fight aggressively against this international threat to stability and peace," he said. "The deletion of the references to the targets is unfair, and it causes damage to the moral position and standing of the Security Council on other matters."

Rabbi Marvin Hier, dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, issued a statement condemning the Security Council for refusing to identify Jews as the principal targets of the recent attacks.

"The council's statement shows that despite the 'new world order,' the old standard vis-a-vis Israel and the Jewish people is alive and well at the United Nations," he said.

"Let us not forget that during its deliberations on the Hebron massacre, the Security Council had forcefully and correctly identified the victims as Arabs, but now the Security Council has apparently allowed itself to be held hostage by some non-aligned countries who would have the world pretend that the victims were Martians," he added.

Syria will remain on U.S. list of terror-sponsors

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

WASHINGTON — Syria and five other nations will remain on the U.S. State Department's list of countries sponsoring terrorism, the administration's top counter-terrorism official has told a Congressional panel.

At a special House of Representatives hearing on the recent bombings of Jewish and Israeli targets in Buenos Aires, Panama and London, the official, Barbara Bodine, said "there is no intention at all of removing any of them" from the list.

Including Syria, those on the list are Iran, Iraq, Sudan, Cuba and North Korea.

"There are efforts by some of them to get themselves removed [from the list], but we've made it very clear to them there are a number of steps that need to be taken," Bodine said.

She added that "the circumstantial evidence is there" to link Iran to the July 18 Buenos Aires bombing of the Jewish community headquarters. Secretary of State Warren Christopher earlier made a similar charge on Capitol Hill.

Argentina's ambassador to the U.S., Raul Enrique Granillo Ocampo, told the House subcommittee that his country has been questioning Iranian diplomats in Buenos Aires about the bombing.

"We don't have definite proof of [their] involvement, but we have a lot of clues that convinced us to arrive at this conclusion," he said.

Ocampo told The Jerusalem Post later that the government has questioned everyone in the Iranian Embassy, from Ambassador Suleiman Pour on down, but said that "we have not gotten anything" from them.

"We are not saying the Iranian ambassador was involved; we're saying that philosophically, the Hezbollah and Iran are related, and we are not going to rule out the possibility they are involved," he said.

Bodine's appointed successor as the State Department's coordinator for counterterrorism, Phillip C. Wilcox, will visit Argentina and four of its neighbors later this month to discuss the Buenos Aires attack.

Fighter still ready to go a few rounds

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — At 81, Sam Shrott runs two miles four times a week, and goes three rounds with a punching bag. (He can't find a sparring partner.) When he was 17, Shrott was a prize fighter in the flyweight range (112 lbs.) and hung out with Sammy Luftspring and the late Baby and David Yack.

"I went hungry in 1929-31 right in this country of Canada," Shrott said. "My mother (Sluvia) died at age 34 from gangrene and my father (David) disappeared even though he owned three movie theatres. I was on my own at age 16 and my grandmother couldn't keep me because my aunt's family was already there. It was boxing that enabled me to survive. I couldn't get a job because of anti-Semitism."

When a shop serving free doughnuts and coffee to the unemployed opened on Spadina Avenue, Shrott said he went there immediately, and then went around the block before visiting it for a second time, he was so hungry.

Boxing at flyweight and later at lightweight (135 lbs.), at Mutual Street Arena, Maple Leaf Gardens, and in North Bay, Shrott got coupons from Eatons for merchandise, and later took back the goods to get cash. This and meals at his sister's home, (Ethel Richmond, now 83) kept him going. He had to leave Grade 10 at Central Technical School when his mother died.

He is sorry that more Jewish youngsters today aren't interested in the art of boxing.

"It did wonders for my sense of confidence," he said. "I don't take a backward step from anybody."

A former member of the Jewish Y on Brunswick Avenue and on Bathurst Street, Shrott said he joined Columbus Centre nine years ago because he couldn't get use of the punching bag at the JCC on a regular basis.

At Columbus Centre, his knowledge of the Italian language (he picked it up when overseas) comes in handy. "People often ask me, 'Are you Italian or Jewish?' And I say, in a joking way, 'I'm Jewish, do you want to go a few rounds?' "

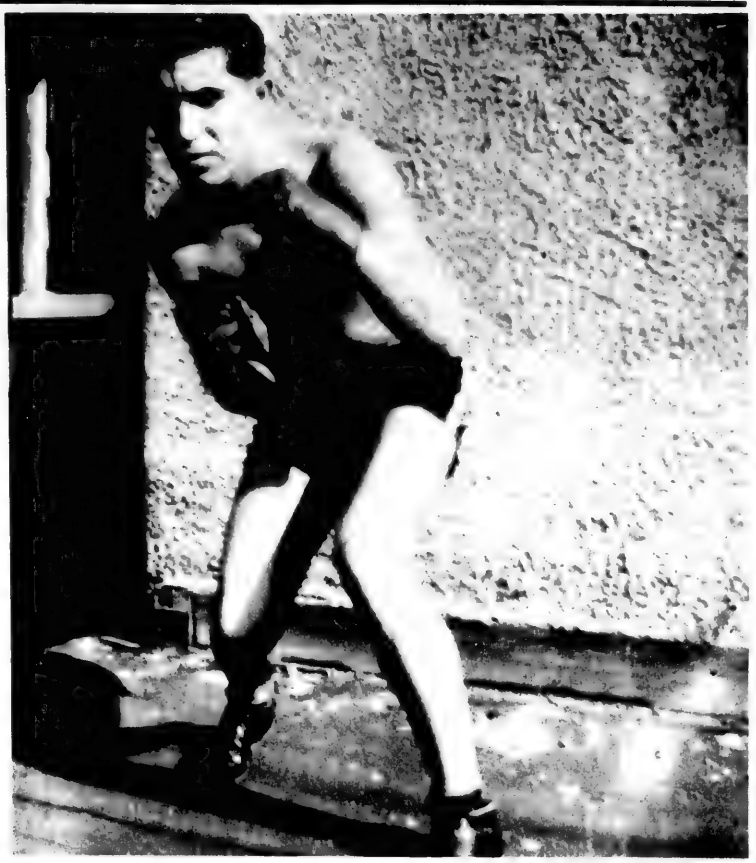
He quit boxing at age 20, and found various jobs, one as an apprentice pressing seams,(at $5 a week) and one making ticker tape. But his ambition was to become an electrical contractor, and he got a job threading conduit pipe when the Royal York Hotel was being built.

After World War II and service in the Canadian Army in Sicily, Italy, France, Germany, Holland and Belgium, rising to the rank of sergeant, Shrott realized his ambition and opened his own contracting business in 1953, Aconic Electric Company. One of his jobs was wiring Honest Ed's warehouse restaurant.

Now retired, he and his wife, Mildred, married for 48 years, have lived in a Langholme Avenue bungalow for 32 years. They have two sons, Dr. Barry Shrott, a general practitioner, and Steve Shrott, a script writer.

Looking back over an eventful and satisfying life, Shrott still shakes his head over how his mother had the courage to bring him, at the age of seven, and his sister at the age of nine, all the way from Galicia, to Union Station in Toronto, on her own, as his father was already here.

It's clear where his gumption comes from.



At the age of 17, Sam Shrott, now 81, earned his living as a boxer, being paid in merchandise coupons. He went on to become a successful electrical contractor.

Sam Shrott, and his wife, Mildred, married for 48 years. He wishes more youngsters would learn the art of boxing.

Etrog's sculpture recalls Canadians' D-Day sacrifices

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Sorel Etrog, one of Canada's most notable sculptors, recently attended a ceremony in Reviers, a town along the Normandy coast of France, at which one of his works was unveiled to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the D-Day landing of Canadian troops.

The sculpture, called "Sunbird II," is made of bronze, weighs about 900 lbs. and stands about two metres, 20 cm (7 feet) high. A neatly stylized abstraction, its various elements may represent a wheel or the sun, ribs, a warrior's helmet and parts of a bird. As the artist puts it, the sculpture seems to pulsate with the "energy of growth."

Etrog first cast the piece in 1963, and alternate castings are owned by the Art Gallery of Ontario, the Palm Springs Museum and other art institutions; the artist's study resides in a museum in Basel, Switzerland.

Another casting, on display in the Museum of Rodin in Paris, caught the eye of the mayor of Reviers, Serge Ozou, and other citizens of the town, and they requested it from the Canadian Embassy.

"The Canadian Embassy contacted me, and we had to make arrangements for the Museum of Rodin to release the piece," Etrog explained. "For that to happen, we had to find a donor, which we did. The donor gave it to Canada so that Canada in turn could donate it to France."

Besides Etrog, former Canadian defence minister Barney Danson attended the unveiling, as did Jean Fredette, the cultural attache at the Canadian Embassy.

"This work ... is a permanent memory of the sacrifices accomplished by the young Canadian soldiers in the name of freedom," said Benoit Bouchard, Canada's ambassador to France. "This sculpture, standing beside a Canadian maple tree and only a few steps from the military cemetery of Beny-Reviers, is a symbol of peace important for all of us."

Etrog, who was 11 when the Russians liberated his hometown of Jassi, Romania, in 1944, said he could identify with the sense of gratitude the townspeople expressed towards their liberators, even after half a century.

"It was a very moving homage by this small town to Canada. For the people who live there, Canada will always have a very special place in their life. Every house was flying a little Canadian flag."

Etrog said he and Danson were impressed at how well the schoolchildren of Reviers seem to know their history. As a school project, the youngsters constructed a model of the battlefield, showing the positions and movements of the troops on the first day of the Allied invasion, and where each soldier had fallen.

Student groups restructure for 1994-95 academic year

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For Jewish students at local university campuses, the 1994-95 academic year will mark the implementation of a restructuring effort that has been in the works for at least two years.

The Jewish Student Federation (JSF) at York University, the Jewish Student Union (JSU) at the University of Toronto, and the Jewish Student Council (JSC) (which serves Ryerson Polytechnic University, Seneca College, U of T's Scarborough campus and York's Glendon College) have been separate groups until now.

Under the new plan, being co-ordinated by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto (JFGT), the three groups will retain their individual structure, but will come under the umbrella of a central campus services agency.

A budget increase of $140,000 over the current three-campus expenditures of $266,000 will allow for "better programming and [adequate] salary dollars," said Morris Zbar, director of community planning and allocations and associate director of JFGT.

The $140,000 is expected to come from increased UJA contributions, said Zbar. "If not, we'll have to look at some of the endowment funds. We will not take money away from our [other] agencies."

While recent financial woes of the Jewish Community Centre have "consumed quite a lot of [the Federation's] energy," the restructuring of campus organizations is moving ahead, stressed Zbar, although at a slower pace than originally anticipated.

The campus restructuring resulted from "a feeling that the campus organizations have been isolated both from each other and from the [Jewish] community at large," said Zbar. "We felt it important in terms of continuity to ensure that there's better linkage." The restructuring is based on a model which is being encouraged in a number of North American cities, said Zbar.

Each of the three campus organizations will have its own programming co-ordinator, while a director of central campus services will oversee all the groups. Rabbi Michael Skobac, currently JSU director, will serve as chaplain for all the campuses.

Some students have expressed concern about losing autonomy when the new structure is put in place.

By having a programming co-ordinator for each group, students will be able to continue to address the needs of their individual campuses, answers Zbar, adding that the organizations will still have local lay boards or committees.

Hiring the director of central campus services is Zbar's current priority — a task he is undertaking in collaboration with the boards of all three campus groups. When he spoke to The CJN last week, the list of candidates had been culled for interviews. "We want to make sure we have a top professional," said Zbar.

The director will be placed at York University at first, until a co-ordinator for the York JSF is hired. Because of the restructuring, former JSF executive director Claire Sookman is no longer with the organization. David d'Ancona and Susie Meisels, JSF students, have been serving as co-executive directors over the summer.

"We're trying to phase [the restructuring] in stages. We don't want to disrupt services," said Zbar.

After a co-ordinator is hired for JSF, the campus committee will begin to search for a co-ordinator for JSU at U of T, so that Rabbi Skobac can assume his chaplaincy duties for all the campuses involved.

"I think it's a very good thing," says Michael Goldberg, program co-ordinator for the JSC, which serves Ryerson, Seneca, Scarborough and Glendon. "The small campuses don't get much recognition."

D'Ancona looks forward to seeing better integration with off-campus Jewish agencies.

Zbar is hoping that the restructuring will be complete by the end of the year.

York student gets scholarship at TAU

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Osnat Baroz, 22, radiates enthusiasm and determination. The Ashdod native, now living in Thornhill, emigrated to Toronto with her family when she was in Grade 11. She is one of three York University students who will be in Israel on scholarships for the 1994-95 academic year.

"In the long run it will be worth it," says Baroz, who will be focusing on Religious Studies at Tel Aviv University (TAU). She is being funded by the Leonard Wolinsky Scholarship and the Gertrude and Jack Friedman Memorial Award. She is also a recipient of the Morris M. Pulver Scholarship Fund of Israel.

Because Baroz is married, her arrangements for Israel have been more complex than for the other scholarship recipients. Shai, Baroz' husband of three years, is a landscaper. He will join her in Israel from October to April, and has been very supportive, she said.

A graduate of Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), Baroz recently finished her second year of the Jewish Education program at York. She has already been teaching for five years at the Am Echad (Thornhill Square) Synagogue Sunday School held at Rosedale Heights Public School, and worked for three years as a private Hebrew tutor.

"I really love teaching," says Baroz. "I appreciate both [Canadian and Israeli] systems. I think if you want to be a Jewish teacher here, a big part of it comes from Israel as well. I was young when I came here, and I feel I still have a lot to learn. What better place than Israel?"

Baroz is the daughter of Peter and Mary Silberstein.

Osnat Baroz

David Posner

David Posner, 21, will also be be studying at TAU this year. An anthropology and sociology student who has completed two years at York University, Posner plans to study international law at the University of Windsor. He received the Abraham Isaac Silver Scholarship, as well as a TAU scholarship and the Albert Latner Scholarship.

Posner is an alumnus of Forest Hill Collegiate, where he graduated at the top of his class. A former youth leader at Beth Sholom Synagogue, he has also tutored Hebrew and worked with youth in past summers as a camp lifeguard and a sailing and windsurfing instructor.

Posner was not available to be interviewed, having left for Israel earlier this summer. He is the son of Karen and Gary Posner.

Samantha Berman

Samantha Berman, 20, the recipient of the Hebrew University Scholarship, recently completed her second year in the Environmental Studies program at York University.

A CHAT graduate, she plans to expand her educational horizons this year by taking "a lot of" political science courses having to do with the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Berman also hopes to volunteer at an absorption centre when she is in Israel.

Berman attended Hebrew and religious school at Temple Har Zion until Grade 10. She entered CHAT in Grade 9 after finishing Grade 8 at Johnsview Public School in Thornhill. Now living in Richmond Hill, Berman came to Canada at the age of 1 from Johannesburg, South Africa. Her parents are Roy and Naomi Berman.

In first year university, Berman ran Friday night Reform services for Baycrest Centre residents on a volunteer basis. Last year she was women's issues coordinator at York student newspaper the Excalibur.

Israeli scholar extends studies

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jacob Eisenberg's experience as the Israeli recipient of the Hebrew University Scholarship exchange program for 1993-94 was "very good for me," he says. So good, in fact, that he has extended his stay at York University for a second year.

Eisenberg, 29, would like to finish his Master's degree in Psychology at York. "In Psychology in general, North America is the leading place," he told The CJN during a recent interview on campus. York was one of the few North American universities to offer a graduate level exchange program in his preferred area, he said. Eisenberg's thesis concerns social psychological effects on creativity.

The scholarship which brought him to Toronto was established about 17 years ago and is believed to be the oldest exchange program between the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and a Canadian university. Through the scholarship, one York student is sent to the Hebrew university annually, and one student from the Hebrew University is brought to York every other year.

Eisenberg was born in Riga, Latvia, but grew up in Haifa after making aliyah at age 6 with his parents and younger brother. A sister was born in Israel.

After completing high school, Eisenberg served three years in the Israeli army and decided he wanted to travel before completing his education. He took a clerical job for eight months to fund a 15-month trip to India, the Far East, Australia and New Zealand. "It was a good decision," he says.

He completed an undergraduate degree in Psychology and Interdisciplinary Studies at Haifa University, where he also wrote for the student newspaper before embarking on post-graduate work at the Hebrew University.

Over the past few years, he has held a number of part-time and temporary jobs including a position with a psychological institute where he tested potential employees to assess their psychological suitability for institute clients. He has also worked as a group leader for young olim at a summer camp. "That's when I started to brush up my Russian," said Eisenberg.

Jacob Eisenberg

His facility in English was honed at university in Israel. "Most of the material in psychology is in English, even at an undergraduate level," he said. "My reading English was quite good, but conversational wasn't that good." These days, Eisenberg appears to be quite comfortable speaking English.

In April, he presented a paper at an annual symposium on violence and conflict resolution, an area in which he has a particular interest because of his army experience.

Eisenberg has received a York University scholarship to continue his studies.

The Wodinsky Family
would like to take this opportunity to thank all those who gave so much of themselves over the past year during the illness of our son and brother, Moshe Raphael. Words cannot truly express our heartfelt appreciation for all the kindness and support we have received, both before and in the weeks following his death from leukemia. Although we mourn his loss, we have nechama from having come to know so many wonderful and caring people who have reached out to and stood by us in our time of need. We will not forget your thoughtfulness and sincerity. May we only meet for simchas in the future.

Tennis club at JCC to retain 'Jewish tam'

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Though it will be under the auspices of the North York Tennis Association, the tennis club at the Jewish Community Centre next year will retain its Jewish tam.

This is the pledge of Tibor Martinek, provisional president of the new club, which is to have its founding meeting Monday, August 15 at the JCC, at 7 p.m.

"Though there will be no formal affiliation between North York and the JCC, the core membership of the new club will be members of the JCC and the Jewish character will be maintained," Martinek said.

The eight courts are being rebuilt, and a new clubhouse added, at a cost of $240,000, under the federal works program, with the cost divided among the federal, provincial and municipal governments.

Among items to be discussed at the upcoming meeting are fees and a name for the new club. Under the North York Parks and Receation department, tennis clubs run by the muncipality charge annual fees starting at $50.

Martinek predicted that the present membership of 200 will increase to 350 when the new facilities are open for the 1995 season. Work is expected to start in the spring.

The provisional vice-president is Erika Ostrow and provisional public relations chair is Joe Black.

Martinek paid tribute to the efforts of North York Councillor Michael Feldman and Arthur Eggleton, MP for the area, in promoting the rebuilding of the courts. Eggleton toured the JCC and the tennis courts recently.

Gen X barbecue set

TORONTO — Interaction, a new group for Jewish Generation Xers, will hold a kosher barbecue at Sunnybrook Park on Aug. 14 from noon to 4 p.m.

The non-profit organization provides social functions and professional networking and support to Jewish men and women in their 20s. It was founded by eight recent university graduates to fill a perceived gap in the Jewish community. The group is completely volunteer-run, and receives no external funding.

Programs now being planned include employment and professional development sessions, a weekend retreat, Jewish identity programs, and welcoming of newcomers to Toronto.

Interaction aims to provide programming within a Jewish context, linking participants to the broader Jewish community.

For further information, call the group's hotline at (416) 754-5512.

Friends from Poland reunite after 59-year separation

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Salek Sporn was 13 when he last saw his friend Kalmek Israel in their hometown of Tarnow in Poland. The year was 1935 and Israel and his family were leaving for Canada.

This was the beginning of the end of not only Sporn's boyhood, but also a world he would never know again. During the war, Sporn was imprisoned in Siberia and most of his family would die at the hands of the Nazis. He spent two years in a DP camp before coming to Montreal in 1948.

He never forgot his childhood pal, but found no trace of him. Kalmek Israel had become Kelly Hershenhorn, a successful ladies' wear salesman in Toronto, where he had been living since 1935. As was required in Poland, he had gone by his mother's maiden name because his parents' had not had a civil marriage ceremony. Kelly was a nickname he had acquired during his "Canadianization."

For his part, Hershenhorn had no idea who survived from his prewar community.

Fifty-nine years later, the friends were reunited in Montreal this month.

They found they had become, by age 72, quite different people. Hershenhorn is still working and dreads the thought of retirement. Sporn, a tailor by trade who had a stationery store for some years, is now contentedly retired, enjoying his grandchildren and the occasional game of cards.

What separates them the most is their differing concepts of the past. Hershenhorn is of the view "that what is past is past" and can barely remember ever living in Tarnow, which is near Krakow.

On the other hand, Sporn grasps at anything that helps recapture the past. Hershenhorn, for example, brought with him some old school report cards and photos of a Zionist youth group, which Sporn pores over like a map to an enchanted land.

What has brought them together again was their participation in the 50th anniversary commemoration of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising in April last year.

Both had come with their children, and it was they who brought the two men together again after so many years. Sporn's daughter Salena and Hartley Hershenhorn met during their time in Warsaw and discovered their fathers both came from Tarnow.

"I recognized Kalmek right away," Sporn said. He remembered his friend as a good soccer player, but only a fair student.

But Hershenhorn only vaguely remembered the name Sporn, and perhaps that's because Sporn's father had been a town councillor. "I couldn't believe it when he called me Kalmek. I hadn't heard that name in 58 years."

Both almost didn't make it to Poland, and only went at the insistence of their children. "I didn't ever want to go back," said Sporn. Hershenhorn had been to Poland five years earlier with another son, showing him the places where his ancestors had lived.

Ironically, about twice a month for many years, Hershenhorn visited Montreal on business. Now, they hope to pick up the pieces and renew their friendship, on one condition: Hershenhorn wants to talk about something other than Tarnow.

"With him, the shtetl never left him," said Hershenhorn. "But I don't believe in dwelling on the past. Like my son says whenever I start to say 'When I was your age...', it's enough already."

But Sporn, who has been active in Holocaust remembrance and his landsmanshaft, says he is not likely to get over his nostalgia.

"I just want to connect with someone who came from the old world."

CBC TV to feature Marcuse dance troupe

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The Judith Marcuse Dance Company, directed by a former Montrealer now living in Vancouver, will be featured in a CBC network production, States of Grace, to be seen on August 14.

The hour-long performance is also scheduled for the Knowledge Network and TVOntario's French and English channels.

Montreal-born Marcuse, who told The CJN "I'm 100 per cent Jewish and a longtime supporter of Israel," is a choreographer as well as dancer. She was commissioned to do States f Grace for Victoria's Commonwealth Games cultural festival, which precedes the athletic Games opening August 18. The original two-hour production was staged recently at Victoria's 300-seat Kaleidoscope Playhouse and taped by the CBC. The broadcast has been cut to an hour.

Marcuse heads up a 10-person dance company, five women and five men. The company, which has toured extensively in Canada and Europe, gets financial assistance from the Canada Council, the British Columbia government and the city of Vancouver.

Marcuse says States of Grace tells the story of "a woman's journey of self-discovery." A 15-minute film, At the Races, opens the performance to tie in with the dancing. It was produced by the National Film Board and directed by Jewish filmmaker Daniel Conrad, assisted by Marcuse. The film has been seen at the Montreal film festival and has been accepted for viewing at the Lucarno film festival in Switzerland.

States of Grace will tour British Columbia this fall and will be featured as the inaugural dance presentation at the opening of Vancouver's Jewish Community Centre's Norman Rothstein Theatre in November.

Trained as a dancer from age 3, Marcuse began her career with the Grands Ballets Canadiens. She has worked in London, California and Israel and taught dance at York University in Toronto and at Simon Fraser in Vancouver.

She was in Israel for three and a half years, where she danced with the Bar Dor Dance Company. She arrived in Israel just after the 1967 war "and I was thrilled to be there when Jerusalem was united," she told The CJN.

It was in Israel that she met her husband Richard, who works here for Oxfam. They have a 10-year-old daughter.

Israeli tennis star buoyed by key win in tournament

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — What a difference a win can make to the outlook of a tennis player.

Prior to defeating American Todd Martin at the recent $1.7-million Player's Ltd. International Canadian Open held at York University, Israeli tennis star Amos Mansdorf was seriously considering ending his career in December after more than 10 years on the pro tennis circuit.

"I've been feeling horrible for the past 12 months," Mansdorf said. "I've been suffering from the Epstein-Barr virus that has made me tired and weary at tornaments. As a result, I haven't performed nearly as well as I used to. Maybe, at age 29, I should start thinking about retiring."

Mansdorf has been on the down side of his career in 1994. He has failed to advance beyond the second round in 12 tournaments, did not defeat a high-ranking opponent, and saw his ranking drop to 80th in late July. It was his lowest since 1985 when he was ranked 85th.

Todd Martin turned out to be just what the doctor ordered for Mansdorf. Seeded second in the tournament, the eighth-ranked Martin was considered a favorite over the struggling Israeli.

Instead, it was Martin who struggled in the second-round match. After blasting aces in his service games to win a tie-breaker in the first set, (7-6 (4)), Martin faltered to Mansdorf's persistent groundstrokes and cross-court backhands in the second set. Mansdorf won the second set 6-3 and appeared to have the upper hand in the third set.

But, instead of playing, Martin defaulted due to a groin injury that plagued him throughout June and July. "Amos played me well. He moved me from side to side, making it difficult for me to retrieve his shots, let alone return them," Martin said. "Other players lose their concentration when they play an injured player. But not Amos. He is very tough mentally and rarely beats himself. He showed his talent in his match against me."

Mansdorf was buoyed after his impressive victory. He had last beaten Martin in in Washington in July 1993. Moreover, Mansdorf's win over Martin marked only his eighth victory in 56 attempts against opponents who are ranked in the top 10.

"My win against Martin showed me what I could do when I believe in myself. I kept telling myself 'Make the return and keep the ball in play.' I knew by the way he was moving that he had some sort of knee problem," Mansdorf said.

"My problem was not to allow his injury to affect my game plan of returning his groundstrokes deep along the baseline. I stuck to my plan and that isn't easy. Remember how Michael Chang, when he was injured, beat Ivan Lendl at the French Open because Lendl underestimated him? I wasn't going to let that happen to me."

Mansdorf's victory over Martin gave him the one ingredient he needs to continue his career: hope in the future. His impressive showing at the Player's Ltd. International included defeating Grant Stafford of South Africa 6-2, 6-4 before losing to American Rickey Reneberg 2-6, 6-0, 6-4 in the third round. Mansdorf earned $18,900 to add to his career total of the $2.1 million for his best tournament result in 1994.

"This is the time of year that is crucial. If I continue to play well between now and the U.S. Open in September, I'll be back ranked in the top 50. That will convince me that I belong on the pro tennis circuit and will motivate me to continue my career beyond December," Mansdorf said.

Mansdorf's career has been filled with milestones. He has won six titles, most notably a first prize of $395,492 for the Paris Indoor title in 1988. Mansdorf upset Jimmy Connors and Brad Gilbert to win his country's Tel Aviv Classic in 1987 and donated $25,000 of his prize money to the Israel Tennis Centres, his training headquarters while growing up in Israel.

One of Mansdorf's fondest memories came when he teamed with fellow Israeli Gilad Bloom to defeat Czechoslovakia in Davis Cup play en route to a quarter-final finish in 1987 — the best record Israel ever had in the Davis Cup.

"I've said this many times, but I really mean it. I would prefer to win the Davis Cup for Israel than to win Wimbledon for myself. Wherever I go, I am constantly linked to the achievements of my country. That's the way I want to be remembered in tennis: as an athlete who put his country before himself," Mansdorf said.

Mansdorf was one of three Jewish players competing at the Player's Ltd. International. Americans Jim Grabb and Aaron Krickstein both failed to advance beyond the second round. Grabb defeated Sebastein Lareau of Boucherville, Que., 6-4, 6-2, before losing to top seed Sergi Bruguera of Spain 6-1, 6-4. Krickstein, seeded 13th, defeated American Jeff Tarango 6-2, 6-2 before being upset by another American, Chuck Adams 6-4, 6-4.

Although he's only 27, Krickstein has been playing on the pro tennis circuit for 12 years. Despite the fact that most of the teenagers that turned pro before 18 have failed to endure in the sport for more than six years (look at Jimmy Arias, Jennifer Capriati, Andrea Jaeger among many others), Krickstein has endured mainly because of strong guidance.

"Some of the teenage stars had parents pushing them because they saw their child as the means to support a family," Krickstein said. "That was not my case. My father [a doctor] never needed my money to support the family. He gave me inspiration, love and guidance, which sometimes meant pushing me more into the game. I never was forced to play tennis against my will. If that was the case, I never would have the desire to stay in the game."

Krickstein has won nine titles — including two in Tel Aviv. He still holds the record of being the youngest player ever to win a pro tour singles title when he won the Tel Aviv Classic in 1983, at the age of 16.

TORONTO — By the time Philip Band joined the Toronto B'nai Brith lodge in 1940, the fraternal organization was a fixture on the local Jewish scene.

The lodge, established in 1919, was "sort of an exclusive club," recalled Band, 80, a retired lawyer. Prospective members were interviewed before being admitted to the lodge, he told The CJN .

"We had meetings at the Royal York Hotel twice a month, and the head table was always covered with a white tablecloth," Band said. Speakers included prominent American politicians who were paid $100, he said — a large sum at the time.

To celebrate the 75th anniversary of the lodge, which has flourished in recent years, a gala dinner will be held August 18 at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue. Veteran politician Mitchell Sharp, now special aide to Prime Minister Jean Chretien, will speak on the upcoming Quebec elections.

The lodge was the only one of its kind in Toronto for over two decades. After the 1940s, when the lodge grew to include over 800 members, groups broke off to form new lodges. There are now 22 lodges in the Toronto area.

Over the past decade four of those lodges — Empire, Forest Hill, Eglinton and Sportsmen's — again merged with the original lodge to form Metro Toronto Lodge, which now has over 400 members.

Members range in age from late 20s to late 80s, said lodge president Allen Feig, who admits only to being "over 60."

Avi Hyman, 31, a doctoral student at Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE), is chairman of the board of Metro Toronto Lodge and was part of the rejuvenation of Eglinton Lodge.

About eight years ago, he recalled, he was affiliated with a group of young Jewish men who wanted to join a lodge with aging members to rejuvenate it. Impressed by the community work and welcoming attitude of Eglinton Lodge members, close to 20 of them joined en masse.

"I'm delighted to see younger people taking over," said Harry Pachter, 80, who served as the first president of Eglinton Lodge.

"These fellows were very much interested in making us part of it," said Hyman. "One of the things we did was to reinstitute a more active athletic program in order to attract other young people."

The lodge now boasts three baseball teams, three basketball teams and a hockey team.

Recent lodge activities included a "Jestfest" comedy night to raise money for three local charities and a musical presentation at Earl Bales Park. Members deliver Passover and Purim parcels, and recently instituted three scholarships in honor of the lodge's 75th anniversary.

Among its past accomplishments, the lodge counts the endowment of Hillel House at the University of Toronto, assistance in starting Camp B'nai Brith and establishing a soldiers' house in Eilat.

Today Metro Toronto Lodge has close to 50 members in their 20s and 30s, Hyman estimates.

Les Aaron, 30, joined Eglinton Lodge three years ago "primarily to play basketball," he admitted. He is now a member of the lodge executive.

"It was a lot of fun playing sports, but it's very superficial just to send in my fees and play basketball. B'nai Brith is very issues-oriented, and that appealed to me. It appealed to me to be able to contribute something," he said.

Jazz pianist goes solo route

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Jazz pianist Marilyn Lerner says it is too early to judge public reaction to her first solo recording, but from her peers she has received the equivalent of an A+ .

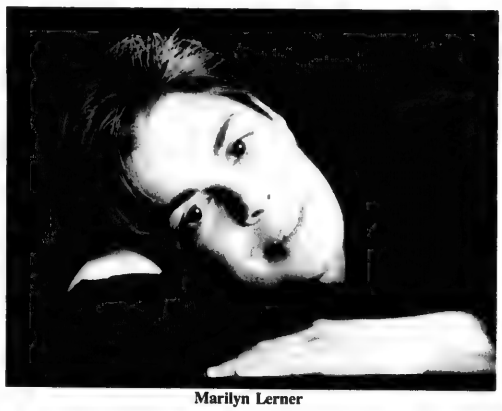
At the beginning of July, one of the songs on her Miss Overboard album was recognized as Best Single by the Society of Composers, Authors and Music Publishers of Canada. The award was bestowed at the DuMaurier Jazz Competition, held in conjunction with the annual Montreal International Jazz Festival.

Lerner recorded the 11 original songs for Miss Overboard last December and January on a Bosendorfer grand piano at the Winnipeg Art Gallery. She has dedicated the album — on the Justin Time Records (Montreal) label — to working parents and their children.

She describes it as a personal statement on art, her relation with her daughter and her approach to music. Miss Overboard was officially launched June 3 at Winnipeg's West End Cultural Centre.

Originally from Montreal, Lerner studied jazz at York University and attended master classes in New York. "I have played at numerous bar mitzvahs and weddings," she says.

She stopped off in Winnipeg in 1987 on her way to Vancouver and stayed. "I found some work here," she says. "This is an inexpensive city with a thriving arts community."



Marilyn Lerner

Lerner has become a well-known member of the Winnipeg jazz scene. She has performed with numerous other artists including touring musicians Tito Puente and Paquito d'Rivera. In 1993, she and guitarist Larry Roy recorded Quarter To Three, also for Justin Time Records. She has been performing with bassist Lori Freedman as the Queen Mab duo.

At the 1993 DuMaurier Jazz Festival, Lerner received a special mention as a "talent deserving wider recognition." With the release of Miss Overboard and invitations to appear at jazz festivals in Edmonton, Calgary, Toronto, Ottawa and Vancouver this summer, Lerner's time has come.

She reports it takes six months before sales figures on a new album are known. With Miss Overboard behind her, she has already started working on her second album.

CITY OF TORONTO

New Building Permits By-Law & Increase in Fees

Buildings and Inspections

The City of Toronto has revised its Building Permits By-Law to conform with the 1993 Building Code Act. This takes advantage of several new features of the Act which help streamline the building permit process and speed up construction. For example, the City can now

- issue conditional permits,
- accept equivalent materials, systems and building designs,
- transfer permits when ownership changes, and
- issue change of use permits (where no construction will take place).

The new Building Permits By-Law is effective July 4, 1994.

Increase In Fees Starting July 4, 1994

- Construction Permit

Cost of Construction	Fee
$4,000 and under	$50
Over $4,000	$12 for each $1,000 or portion
Partial (phased) Permit	$50
Change of Use Permit	$50
Conditional Permit	20% of the regular permit fee but not less than $100 (in addition to the regular permit fee)
Transfer of Permit	$50
Deferral of Revocation	$50
After Hours Inspection	$50 per inspector per hour or part, but not less than $150 per inspector

• Rooming House Licensing	Fee
Classes 1, 2, 5	$100
Class 3	$200
Class 4	$300

- Building Compliance Reports $60 per enquiry/ municipal address

- Preliminary Zoning By-Law Reviews

Type of Proposal	Fee
Signs, accessory buildings & structures, verandahs, porches, decks, additions not exceeding 10 square metres	$30
New buildings and structures, other than accessory: estimated construction cost $1,000,000 or less	$125
New buildings and structures, other than accessory: estimated construction cost over $1,000,000	$400
All other proposals	$75

Please note: Preliminary Zoning By-Law Reviews are now optional but still recommended before applying to the Committee of Adjustment or for Site Plan Control approval.

EYE ON ARTS

Young Entrepreneur Takes Bow, Then Takes Wing: Andrew Pifko is a 24-year-old zoology graduate from the University of Toronto with more than a passing interest in the fine arts. Long interested in theatre in particular, Pifko was the producer and director of Chess, a 2-½ hour operatic musical composed by the rock group Abba, which received a single benefit performance in Toronto in July for the Juvenile Diabetes Foundation.

The production involved the donated services of some 25 musicians and 32 singers, all professionals, and many other volunteers. Musical director was Bruce K. Hill, a soloist with the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir. Pifko, who has directed four musicals previously, left last week for Japan to begin a one-year assignment teaching English.

* * *

Going, Going, Gone: About 125 works donated from private collections were sold at a fine art auction at the Park Plaza Hotel, Toronto, in late July, raising almost $50,000 for the Jewish religious outreach organization, Ohr Somayach. Many Canadian and international artists were represented, including Dali, Picasso and Calder. The highest bid received from the roughly 250 people in attendance was $7,300 for a work by Salvador Dali. The auction house was Rosen Fine Art. Owned by Stephen and Ruth Rosen, the company specializes in auctions of donated art for non-profit organizations.

Toronto Dance Festival: The fourth annual fringe Festival of Independent Dance Artists (fFIDA) takes place in Toronto Aug. 12-21. Offering 16 diverse performances, each an hour in length, the festival is unique for being entirely non-curated. Co-founded and directed by Toronto choreographers Allen Kaeja and Michael Menegon, fFIDA has been regarded as a "runaway success" that has attracted more than 8,000 patrons to date.

Artists include Allen Kaeja, Karen Resnick Kaeja, Shula Saltzman, Chick Snipper, Rachel Browne, Bayla Rae Goldman and Valerie Striar. For scheduling and ticket information, contact the Festival hotline, (416) 921-6816.

A special improv performance choreographed by Allen Kaeja and featuring selected artists takes place in the Atrium of the CBC Broadcast Centre, 250 Front St. W., Aug. 12, 12.30 to 1.30 p.m. Admission is free.

Memorial to Barbara Frum: Last month, CBC president Anthony Manera unveiled a sculpture in memory of Barbara Frum, the Canadian broadcaster who died in 1992 of leukemia at age 54. Sculpted by Montreal artist Dominique Blain, the work is on permanent public display in the Barbara Frum Atrium of the Canadian Broadcast Centre in Toronto.

The work comprises television monitors showing 12 different programs, photographs and mirrors, which combine to engulf viewers, making them part of the reflection of the images of one of Canada's outstanding broadcasters.

Blain is one of 18 artists who submitted proposals for a commission last fall. "Blain's work is very much in keeping with the style in which Barbara Frum approached her work," said Manera. "It is honest, straightforward and challenging. I am sure Barbara would have been honored by this work dedicated to her memory."

Cello soloist

North York Performing Arts Centre: The Jean-Francois Paillard Chamber Orchestra has cancelled its North American tour and concerts at the NYPAC that had been set for Oct. 1 and 2. The chamber orchestra I Musici de Montreal, founded by cellist Yuli Turovsky in 1983, has been signed for those dates. Considered one of Canada's leading chamber groups, I Musici has more than 20 recordings to its credit and has toured internationally to great critical acclaim. Turovsky intends to appear both as conductor and as cello soloist.

Also at the North York Performing Arts Centre, the cast of the blockbuster musical Show Boat undergoes a major change this week. The current company, headed by John McMartin, Elaine Stritch, Lonette McKee, Rebecca Luker, Mark Jacoby and Michel Bell, gives it final Toronto performance on Sunday, Aug. 14, then moves to Broadway's Gershwin Theatre where Show Boat is scheduled to open Oct. 2.

The new Toronto cast is headed by award-winning TV and film actress Cloris Leachman, who is perhaps best known for her role as Phyllis on The Mary Tyler Moore Show in the 1970s. In her 40-year acting career, Leachman has appeared in more than 30 big-screen films, 75 television series, 30 made-for-TV movies, and multiple TV specials and theatrical productions. In Show Boat, she plays Cap'n Andy's irascible wife Parthy, opposite John McMartin as Cap'n Andy, until September. Robert Morse, who created the role of Cap'n Andy in the original Toronto company, returns from a three-month hiatus early next month.

Down Home Cape Breton Fiddle: Eighteen-year-old fiddler Ashley MacIsaac, who has played on stage with Paul Simon and The Rankin Family, gives a free lunchtime performance, Friday Aug. 12 beginning at 12.15 p.m. on the Waterfall Stage of First Canadian Place, Toronto.

Local talent wins lead

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A young Toronto actor who played juvenile leads at the Leah Posluns Theatre is returning to the local stage from New York, this time as the female lead in a play produced in a brand new theatre.

Elyssa Livergant, 20, daughter of Lynda Livergant and the late Harold Livergant, head of Extendicare, is playing the role of a woman saved from drowning by a Cape Cod writer. Seascape with Sharks and Dancer, by the American playwright Don Nigro, is a full-length serio-comedy about how the near victim and her rescuer develop a relationship which chases their own personal demons. Michael Savage plays opposite Elyssa in this two-hander, while Edward Louis Cook directs. . It runs from August 3 to 14.

The new theatrical venue, The Space, is at 115 Wolseley St; one block north of Queen St; off Bathurst St. The producing non-profit company, Treego Productions, is devoting proceeds of this run to KYTES, Kensington Youth Theatre Employment Skills.

This is the first time Elyssa has been cast as the lead of a play, though she had important roles in two off-off-Broadway productions in New York, Come Back to the Five and Dime, Jimmy Dean, Jimmy Dean and The Widows.

In Toronto, she had roles in Almonds and Raisins and Dori at the Leah Posluns

Elyssa Livergant

Theatre when she was only 12.

But this young veteran of show business decided, in her own words, "to get out of the business," and she opted out of any serious acting while attending Forest Hill Collegiate.

The bug hit her hard on graduation, though, and she spent two years at the American Academy of Dramatic Arts in New York. But she hasn't lost touch with the academic life, either, and hopes to finish a degree in English at the University of Toronto, preparatory work for which she did in New York.

Rain falls on performer's annual show

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It was an unkind rain that fell on Eva Fishman's parade at outdoor Skylight Theatre recently. The veteran entertainer, who has suffered a stroke, and who lost her husband, Moishe Turk this year, had to cancel her annual show 40 minutes after it started when the clouds opened and drenched the 1,500 attending.

Fishman started out gamely in the evening she billed as a tribute her late orchestra leader husband. She had difficulty walking to the microphone, but advised the audience not to panic if she fell.

"If Pavarotti can wear a tablecloth when he sings, then I can wear a handkerchief," she said, fluttering a piece of white cloth.

Her first number was There's no business like show business and at the end of it she was crying. Then came one of her old favorites I'll be coming around the mountain to which she improvised the lines, "I'll be following the dipper, I'll be home for Yom Kippur."

The entertainer's feisty nature was revealed when she several times berated Neal Pupulin, leader of the Moishe Turk orchestra, for not playing fast enough.

She even tried to make light of her affliction. "I have a hand that hangs, but I still have to feed it to give it strength to hang."

At her last medical examination, the doctor told her "Some day we'll make you good as new." This brought a heartfelt round of applause.

After Zoom Golly, Golly and Gefilte Fish, Fishman said she liked the audience's participation so much she would book them for next year's concert.

Arnie Wiskin, master of ceremonies, opened the foreshortened show.

Drabinsky breaks ground on $24.5 million theatre

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Corresondent

VANCOUVER — Showbiz entrepreneur Garth Drabinsky was in Vancouver recently to break ground for his company's $24.5 million theatre in the heart of downtown.

Joining him in the ceremony were B.C. Employment Minister Glen Clark, and the 1,800-seat theatre's architect, Moshe Safdie.

"Vancouver has clearly established itself as the second most important theatre market in Canada," said Drabinsky, "and we expect this will make it the most important theatrical market in the Pacific Northwest."

The theatre is expected to draw attendance from the neighboring state of Washington, which includes Seattle, as well as from Vancouver Island, which includes Victoria and Nanaimo as major centres.

Financing for the project includes a $5.25 million commercial mortgage loan provided by the provincial government.

In return, Drabinsky's Live Entertainment Corp. (Livent) will impose a surcharge of $1 per ticket during the term of the mortgage.

This is expected to generate at least $630,000 annually to help non-profit, professional performing arts groups in the province. Clark said this funding is in addition to funds otherwise allocated to the arts by the province.

Vancouver economy

Drabinsky said tourism studies indicate the theatre will pump $165 million a year into the Vancouver economy. He described its job potential in terms of Livent's experience with Showboat at the similar-sized North York Performing Arts Centre.

"On any given night," he said, "between the musicians and the front of the house people and the stage crew, Showboat employs 100 to 120 people, not counting the actors."

Drabinsky said the new building will permit open-ended commercial runs which are not possible at the only other major theatre, the Queen Elizabeth.

He said his production of Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat, which ran here for 10 weeks last summer, could have run from eight to 10 months had a permanent theatre space been available.

He estimates The Phantom of The Opera, which had two short runs in Vancouver, could have played for up to two years.

Safdie's design calls for a facade of granite, decorative metallic shingle and pre-cast concrete, giving a two-dimensional side view of the auditorium and outlining the balcony, dress circle, orchestra seats and stage.

The entrance will feature a five-storey glass cone enclosing a staircase in front of a large mirrored wall. The design emphasizes intimacy — the back row of the balcony is only 30 metres from the stage.

The new theatre, still not named, is directly across the road from the public library complex, also designed by Safdie. The theatre is scheduled to open in December 1995. Drabinsky said he will consider offers to sell naming rights to a corporation or individual.

Livent owns and operates the Pantages Theatre in Toronto, and operates the North York Performing Arts Centre.

Magic, Mysticism, and Hasidism, by Gedalyah Nigal (Aronson Press (price not stated).)

Is Judaism a rational religion? This is how it is usually presented, at least since the time of the Enlightement period when ghetto walls began to crumble and Jews became an integral part of Western culture. Jewish writers and thinkers emphasized elements that were acceptable to the modern sensibility: ethical monotheism, appealing ideals and universal aspects of the Torah.

But this rationalization of Judaism was one-sided and false. It did not include the lifestyle of many Jews who clung to an elaborate structure of legends, folklore and superstition. Although often explained away as quaint vestiges of an outmoded outlook, this body of thought and practice was an essential part of Jewish consciousness.

Gedalyah Nigal, a professor of Hebrew literature at Bar-Ilan University in Israel, introduces the reader to the entire range of subjects that make up the magical-mystical dimension of chassidic teaching and folklore: wonderworking individuals who were able to perform inexplicable feats, the ability to quickly traverse great distances, the transmigration of souls, the dangers from dybbuks, the ritual of exorcism, the power of amulets and the journey to the Garden of Eden and back.

A dybbuk is a malignant spirit that attaches itself to a living person, especially to one left vulnerable by sin. The dybbuk speaks through the occupied person's mouth with a new voice. It can be driven out by exorcism and usually leaves via the small toe.

In this fascinating work, the author discusses several cases of exorcism including communion with spirits. In one instance a rabbi indicates "I warned him not to pass through his eyes, since that would result in the destruction of his eyesight. He called out to me, "So then I shall come out of his mouth!" And I warned him again: "so then I shall emerge through his teeth without uprooting any, except the one front tooth serving as my exit." Yet I stood by my warning. Thereupon he asked me, "Very well then, through which organ do you want me to depart?" I replied, "Through the small toe on the left foot, between the nail and the flesh."

Gilgul Neshamot refers to the belief that after death the soul is reincarnated in a new physical form, whether human, animal or inanimate. A mystic master could read the stages of a person's transmigration from marks on his forehead. Good deeds lead to rebirth as a human, bad deeds to rebirth as an animal, depending on the sins involved. The author writes "During the time of Rabbi Isaac Luria, a young man choked during the wedding meal. Luria was not grieved by this, explaining, 'There was a gilgul in the chicken, and the choked one effected its correction and thereby completed his mission in life.' "

The author makes clear that although the folkloristic aspects of Judaism are not edifying or acceptable today, they were understood in the past as realities in a war between "the forces of sanctity" and "the forces of impurity."

This serious study, replete with footnotes for the scholar, will also be of interest to anyone concerned with the supernatural in Jewish thought.

* * *

The Mystical Study of Ruth, edited and translated, with Introduction and Notes by Lawrence A. Englander with Herbert W. Basser Scholars Press, $69.95).

The Zohar, the prime work of Jewish mysticism, contains an enigmatic section to the Biblical Book of Ruth, Midrash HaNe'elam. It is an allegorical work in which the author interprets events and characters in Ruth "as alluding to phenomena in the Divine realm."

The 10 mystical sefirot, symbolic steps to spirituality, as well as aspects of the soul and speculation about the four-lettered name for God, are salient elements in this elusive work.

This significant contribution to Jewish scholarship, the work of Rabbi Lawrence A. Englander of the Solel Congregation in Mississauga, will be of special interest to students of Jewish mysticism.

SECOND IN A FOUR-PART SERIES

When the Canadian economy bit the dust in mid-1990, no one could have forecast how long nor how deep this "economic downturn" would last.

When politicians and economists finally admitted, and perhaps submitted, to the "R" word, things went from bad to worse.

Today, however, these same forecasters are using the "R" word to signify recovery and while many taxpayers wait for that recovery to trickle down, it seems to be the perfect time to address the health of personal finances.

Mired in recession for close to four years, personal finances have taken a beating and now, perhaps more than ever, it is important to talk to financial advisors, investors and tax specialists to ensure maximum results.

The CJN has enlisted the services of four professionals who hail from the world of finance to assess the finances of several families that represent a cross-section of the public.

This is the first of a four-part series. The people featured in the articles are real but their names have been changed to protect their identities.

As well, the advice given pertains only to the people in those situations and readers should contact their own financial advisors to obtain information for themselves.

By YARON HAIK
Special to The CJN

Yaron Haik is an investment advisor at Richardson Greenshields in Richmond Hill. Richardson Greenshields of Canada Ltd. is one of Canada's largest and oldest independent, full-service investment dealers in the country.

I was in my office when the telephone rang. On the other end was a warm voice belonging to Ruth from Richmond Hill. Ruth and Robert, her spouse, wanted to meet with me to review their portfolio. I was delighted.

After gathering some preliminary information we set an appointment. I thanked her for the call, hung up and thought "This is what my job is all about: helping people get the most out of what they have." By reviewing their portfolio together, I would be able to comment on what they were doing right so that they could continue to do those things. I would also be able to remark on what could be done a little differently to achieve better results.

Ruth and Robert are wise and experienced investors whose past investments include stocks, Canada Savings Bonds, GICs and mutual funds. Although they never had a formal financial blueprint in place, they had sought the advice of a professional to assist them with some of their investments.

The most important aspect of investing, I explained, is to feel comfortable with the investments one is going to make. This includes the risks and returns associated with the different investment products available. By enlisting the help of a professional you receive more information, and consequently can make the decision that is best for your individual situation.

Robert and Ruth are both retired and live in a mortgage-free condominium. Their cars are paid for and currently no large expenditures are foreseen. They have no dependents and enjoy traveling when the opportunity arises.

They pay almost $700 per month in condo maintenance and taxes of $1,480 quarterly. They receive a monthly income of $1,600 in social security benefits, $1,500 from Robert's RRIF, and $91 from an existing annuity from Ruth's company pension plan. Ruth's GICs are currently paying her $1,401 and $1,358 on an annual basis. All told, their expenses are a little less than $3,000 per month while their monthly income is about $3,500. The $6,000 that is accumulated over the course of the year is spent on presents for their grandchildren and vacations.

Combined, they have $225,000 in their Registered Retirement Income Funds (RRIFs) and $20,000 in a short-term GIC and liquid cash savings. Robert's RRIF of $145,00 contains two GICs; one is for $5,000 invested at 8.125 per cent, and the balance of $140,000 is invested at 12 per cent. They are both five-year GICs that mature in 1995.

Increased flexibility

Ruth's RRIF is a little more diversified and includes mutual funds valued at $13,300, $18,000 in cash from a recently matured GIC, and two other GICs. The first of these GICs is in the amount of $30,000 invested at 6.875 per cent maturing in November 1995, while the second GIC is $18,000 invested at 6.50 per cent maturing April 1997.

After learning the details of their portfolio and their estate considerations, I decided the most important aspect for this particular couple is a safe and liquid cash flow with increased flexibility.

Eighty per cent, or $175,000, of their investment are maturing between September and November 1995. At first blush, this would be wonderful if rates were returning to 12 per cent. Unfortunately we don't know where interest rates will be one, two or three years from now. If rates stay at four or five per cent, like they have been recently, this might lead to a significant loss of income and quite probably a change in lifestyle.

My initial counsel is to stagger the maturity dates of their income-producing investments to diversify against the risk of reinvesting at low interest rates. By staggering their maturities the burden of budgeting and planning is lessened, as payments can be matched up with income.

In addition, Ruth's matured $18,000 GIC is not currently reinvested and should be working harder. At a rate of five per cent, this amounts to $900 per year of forgone income. This is a frequent occurance amongst the investing public, and can be easily eliminated by enlisting the aid of a professional to help monitor investments on a full-time basis.

One of the most important recommendations I made is that Robert should be aware of the CDIC insurance limit that is in effect. Robert's $140,000 GIC in his RRIF exceeds the CDIC insurance limit of $60,000 per individual per institution. In the unlikely event that the financial institution that holds the $140,000 GIC collapses, $89,600 of principle and interest would be lost. That is akin to losing 60 per cent of the value of his RRIF, which would be utterly devastating, and could seriously jeopardize their financial well-being.

Although they are currently receiving income from their GICs, I suggested that once their GICs mature, they consider other alternatives offering safety and liquidity.

Four products are available as GIC alternatives. They are mortgage-backed securities, federal and provincial bonds and stripped bonds. These investments are 100 per cent government guaranteed and all are currently offering rates equal to or greater than their GIC equivalent. In addition they offer the flexibility and opportunity for capital gain and unlimited insurance without sacrificing safety.

A National Housing Act (NHA) mortgage-backed security (MBS) represents an undivided interest in a pool of NHA-insured residential mortgages. Both the insurance of principal and interest and the monthly payments are fully guaranteed by the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, a federal government agency.

MBSs are fast becoming the preferred alternative to GICs. The rate of return for an MBS is comparable to or better than that of a GIC, and in the event of an emergency, Robert and Ruth could cash in the MBS in increments of $5,000. An MBS becomes more valuable if rates have decreased, and could be cashed in at a profit if they chose to do so. In addition, they could have the monthly payouts directly deposited to their bank account to match up with monthly obligations.

There are two types of NHA MBSs; open and closed. A closed MBS is recommended here since the payment schedule and time frame are known in advance of purchase which makes budgeting easier.

The second alternative to GIC investment is the one they had taken in the past but were not currently exploiting. Investing in government of Canada or provincial government bonds, as they did with Canada Savings Bonds (CSBs), is a good alternative. But CSBs are available only once a year, which can be problematic if investment matures at a time when CSBs are not on sale. To rectify this I suggest federal and provincial bonds which are on sale year-round with a wide range of maturities.

Provincial and federal bonds are currently paying the same rates as GICs, with the added benefits of liquidity and capital gains potential that GICs don't offer. Unlike CSBs, if held to maturity the rate does not fluctuate, and a predictable cash flow can be attained.

Thirdly, the use of federally or provincially guaranteed strip bonds is recommended. These bonds, also known as zero coupon bonds, are a solid investment that provide similar or better rates than GICs, and can be purchased and sold in varying increments. They are bought at a discount and mature at face value. That difference is the yield or "interest" earned, which while earned and thus reported every year is not paid out until maturity. To defer paying taxes on income earned but not received, Ruth and Robert should include strip bonds only in the RRIFs where they can compound tax-free.

Reviewing portfolio

For their short-term cash requirements, I recommend federal treasury bills. These are far more liquid than a term deposit or short-term GIC and will pay comparative rates. They are available in a maturity for almost every requirement and they can be bought or sold in increments of $1,000. Once again this product provides for more flexibility and quite often better rates than GICs. For that portion of short-term U.S. funds that they require to accommodate any trips south, U.S. T-Bills are also available.

Robert and Ruth are doing the right things and with just a little fine tuning their financial picture can be greatly enhanced. They are seeking professional help and are reviewing their portfolio fairly regularly. By continually reviewing and expanding their investment horizons beyond GICs to include the products discussed here, their portfolio will be strong, safe and provide for their needs for years to come.

Next Week: Warren Fergus, C.A., Senior Tax Specialist at Soberman Isenbaum & Colomby, will profile a Saskatoon couple who have two children.

CJN Staff Reporter

In order to determine Ruth and Robert's assessment of their financial planning experince, The CJN conducted a follow-up interview with them.

TORONTO — Before meeting with Yaron Haik, Ruth and Robert had met with another financial advisor a few years before, and therefore, they knew what was involved in the planning process.

However, as Ruth said, "I was always under the impression that to buy — say T-Bills — you had to have a large amount to invest. I didn't explore certain areas because I thought you had to invest a lot of money."

Ruth says she now realizes just how many investment vehicles are available.

For people who are retired or those who are facing the prospect, a sense of financial security is paramount.

"No one knows what tomorrow will bring," Ruth said, citing today's low interest rates. "Right now, we are secure."

She described their financial outlook as average. "If we want to take a holiday we can and we have enough to live well. However, we don't go out to restaurants three times a week like we used to. We just don't anymore."

Ruth said her financial planning session was 'very good' and she will continue to seek investment advice every few years to update their portfolio and make sure things are on track.

Workers Stage Lockout

JERUSALEM — Over 4,000 Israel Aircraft Industries workers in Beersheba began sanctions in protest against management's decision to shift production of certain parts for the Astra executive jet to a Spanish company.

Workers at the IAI's Ramta subsidiary locked the plant gates to block shipments and held protest meetings. Among placards hung on the main gate was one reading, "IAI - A Plant that Devours its Workers."

One source predicted the problem would be resolved soon and the workers' sanctions would end.

UJA of Canada Creates Database

JERUSALEM — UJA of Canada now has available a computerized database covering all of its 230 projects in Israel.

This allows for rapid retrieval of information and updating, and can help renew contact with long-ago donors.

Canadian projects in Israel date back to the late 1960s, following the establishment of the UIA of Canada. A few were built earlier through Keren Hayesod. They include community centres, educational, social, sports and recreational facilities, libraries, hospital units and more.

Today, 26 of the Canadian projects in Israel involve more than $1 million.

El Al's Profits

TEL AVIV — At a time when many of the world's airlines are reporting losses, El Al Airlines has reported a profit for the eighth consecutive year.

Rafi Harlev, president of Israel's national airline, said El Al made a profit of $9.9 million in 1993, from revenues of $947.1 million.

He said the number of passengers carried by El Al last year increased by 10 per cent over the previous year. It also transported 185,000 tonnes of cargo.

In June, the government's privatization committee approved the sale of 51 per cent of El Al Airlines to the general public. The actual sale of shares is expected to take place in October when the once-ailing airline is taken out of the 13-year-long receivership under which it has been operating.

Israel-Romania Trade Relations

TEL AVIV — An important step in the growth of trade relations between Israel and Romania was made with the June signing of an agreement by Bank Hapoalim and the Romanian Bank for Foreign Trade.

The arrangement will provide $13 million in credits during a five-year period, guaranteed in part by the governmental Israel Foreign Trade Insurance Company.

These funds will finanace the Israeli component of a $30-million program to computerize the Romanian population registry and supply identity cards for its residents.

This export of Israeli know-how is being made by M.T.I.L. Enterprises 1989 LTD., Tel Aviv.

Biotech Alliance Conference

JERUSALEM — The first U.S.-Israeli biotechnology business partnering conference will take place at the Washington, D.C., Hilton & Towers Jan. 11-12, 1995.

This conference will be sponsored by the U.S.-Israeli Biotech Council, held in conjunction with BioEast '95, the premier annual East Coast biotech meeting.

On the agenda will be the technologies coming from Israeli universities and research centres as well as presentations by emerging Israeli biotechnology firms looking for partners, investors or purchasers.

Special sessions will highlight Israel's place in the world market, technologies available for license and economic incentives for joint ventures.

Jordan wins quest for debt relief

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — Scoring high marks for his historic summit with Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, King Hussein of Jordan has won partial debt relief from Congress.

Less than a week after the Middle Eastern leaders declared an end to their 46-year state of war and returned to their homes, U.S. lawmakers included over $200 million in debt relief to Jordan in the final version of this year's foreign aid bill.

Once the measure is approved by both Houses of Congress, President Bill Clinton is expected to sign it into law.

The $13.6-billion foreign aid package also includes $3 billion in aid to Israel, $2.1 billion to Egypt and $78 million for the Palestinians in Gaza and Jericho.

The United States will use $99 million to write off up to $220 million in Jordanian debt. The actual amount varies depending which loans are paid off and when.

Both Rabin and Hussein made the issue of debt relief for Jordan a priority during their meetings with Clinton during their two-day summit.

After the measure is approved, Jordan will owe the United States approximately $500 million. Other nations, which hold over $6 billion in Jordanian debt, are expected to follow suit with limited debt relief before the end of the year.

While forthcoming in response to Jordan's initial debt-relief request, Congress stipulated in the bill that in order to receive any additional debt write-offs, Jordan must end its boycott of Israel, sign a comprehensive peace treaty with Israel and adhere to the United Nations sanctions against Iraq.

Capitol Hill leaders and White House officials plan to forgive the remainder of Jordan's debt over the next two years if Jordan meets the measure's requirements, sources say.

In a show of support for Jordanian debt relief, Secretary of State Warren Christopher said "Jordan and Israel have done their part. Now we must do ours."

Calling Jordan's debt "crushing" and "crippling," Christopher said, "we're urging Congress to assist Jordan, to send a clear signal to the people of the region that America stands with those who are peacemakers."

The foreign aid package also includes $80 million to assist Israel in resettling refugees from the former Soviet Union and Eastern Europe, and provides $7 million for Middle East regional co-operative ventures between Israel and its Arab neighbors.

The bill included three amendments relating to the Middle East.

The first bans American diplomats from meeting with members of the Palestinian authority anywhere in Jerusalem to discuss matters concerning Gaza and Jericho. The original proposal, which banned all meetings regardless of subject matter, was toned down after strong protests from the State Department, Capitol Hill sources said.

The measure also prohibits the United States from opening any new offices in Jerusalem to dispense aid to Gaza or Jericho. State Department officials last month confirmed that the Agency for International Development was considering opening such an office in eastern Jerusalem.

A second amendment prohibits the United States from sending any aid to the Palestinians until the Palestine Liberation Organization amends the sections of its covenant calling for the destruction of the State of Israel.

The PLO has six months to amend its covenant before Clinton must certify to Congress that the PLO is in compliance.

The bill also includes a non-binding provision urging the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund not to give money to any countries that comply with any facet of the Arab boycott of Israel.

Lobbyists from the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) and Morton Klein, president of the Zionist Organization of America, worked well into the early morning hours ensuring support for these amendments, Jordanian debt relief and the overall bill. The conference committee ended its work shortly before 4 a.m.

"AIPAC worked for passage of the many key provisions in the bill which are critical to Israel's security, to a meaningful peace process and to ensuring a U.S. policy that supports Jerusalem as Israel's undivided capital," an AIPAC spokesperson said.

AIPAC supports the "phased approach to relieve Jordan's debt as it moves toward a full peace treaty with Israel," the spokesperson added.

Klein said he was "gratified" that the bill passed.

This week The CJN features . . . Aufgang Travel

By RUTH SCHWEITZER

TORONTO — the owner of Aufgang Travel says consumers who want to be assured of good service from a travel agency should look for one that is operated by people with experience.

"New agencies are opening every day. I wouldn't deal with them unless I knew they had experience," said Emile Aufgang.

Before engaging an agency's services, he said, individuals representing groups should ask a travel agency how many groups it has booked.

Aufgang Travel specializes in large groups and is the exclusive agent for the annual March of the Living for which some 400 young people from across Canada fly to Poland and Tel Aviv. Aufgang says anyone making arrangements for a group has to be very meticulous.

The function of a good travel agent, he believes, is to accurately convey the wishes of the client to a tour operator. If the line of communication is broken, there could be foul-ups.

Only a travel agent who knows all aspects of the clients' destination can cater to their needs, Aufgang stressed.

Computers play a crucial role in making hassle-free travel arrangements these days, especially for groups, and the best agencies are generally computerized.

Picking the right travel agent comes down to reliability and finding someone who answers your questions fully, so you feel they're giving you proper time and consideration, he said.

Business travellers want inexpensive flights and quick service, he noted. The ideal travel agent should be able to find them hotels that give the best commercial rates.

Aufgang said the travel agent's job with the leisure traveller involves trying to merge a person's wishes with a destination. Aufgang and his staff match a client's temperament and interests with a destination, including hotel accommodation.

"Sending a person who doesn't enjoy art or museums to Rome may be a waste of time, although there are other things there," he said, while people who dislike group activities would be unhappy at a resort where they are expected to participate.

Companies sending top employees on holidays as a reward for reaching their objectives ought to find a travel agent who knows of extraordinary destinations and can plan uncommon activities. On a trip one of Aufgang's incentive-travel groups made to Buenos Aires, they visited the beautiful Iguazu Falls there.

On the final evening of a group that went to London, England, he arranged for a regimental marching band to provide the entertainment. "There were people standing on their chairs, it was so impressive," he said.

For awhile the recession affected incentive travel, but Aufgang has noticed that recently more salespeople have been able to reach their goals.

Aufgang originally opened his travel agency at College and Spadina in 1949; 20 years later he moved to Bathurst Street.

Many Jewish organizations across Canada use the agency, and a third of his clients travel to Israel.

Grant Requests On the Rise

JERUSALEM — Research and development grant requests shot up 100 per cent in July from the same period last year, Industry and Trade Ministry Chief Scientist Yehoshua Gleitman reported.

Since the beginning of the year, the ministry's research committee — headed by Gleitman — approved NIS 790 million in research and development grants, a 30 per cent increase over the same period last year.

During that period, 20 per cent more firms requested grants, and the total number of projects submitted rose 13 per cent.

Since the beginning of the year, 534 companies have requested grants, compared with 428 last year. Firms submitted 1,086 projects, up from 964 last year.

Gleitman said he expects research and development investments to rise between 5 per cent and 10 per cent next year.

Firm Plans To Open Israeli Office

JERUSALEM — Astaire & Partners plans to open an office in Tel Aviv, becoming the first British brokerage firm to do so.

The firm has appointed Daniel Fuchs as their local representative. Fuchs, who has more than 20 years of experience with Israel General Bank specializing in capital market products, will try to find new business and act as a link to Astaire's head office in London.

Astaire is a member of the Securities and Futures Authority, the London Stock Exchange and the International Securities Market Association.

The company said it is well established here, having conducted business with Israeli customers for more than 30 years. It has also acted as broker to the London listings of companies, such as Bank Hapoalim and Dead Sea Works.

Company reports 61 Per Cent Profit Fall

JERUSALEM — Elscint reported a 61 per cent decrease in second quarter net profits to $2.72 million from $7.15 million during the same quarter last year.

Revenues fell to $54.7 million from $60 million, while earnings per share declined to $0.03 from $0.09.

The company attributed the apparent decline in profitability to a one-time gain of $3.5 million in the second quarter last year, resulting from the settlement of a patent suit.

Elscint's shares were down .125 to 2.375 in late trading in New York.

Firm Close To $50 Million Purchase

JERUSALEM — AGIS has announced the planned acquisition of a 70 per cent share in a U.S.-based pharmaceutical firm has reached the concluding stages.

If the deal goes through, a subsidiary will be set up, jointly managed by Agis and the U.S. company. Agis's total investment is estimated at some $50 million, of which $24 million will be funded by Agis and the remainder funded by banks, shareholders and other sources.

At present most of Agis activity is in the local market. CEO Maury Arkin has said the new arrangement "will change the profile of our company's activities."

He said the purchase would open up new markets to the company, predicting "half of our activity abroad and half in Israel by 1997."

TRAVEL TALK

By BILL GLADSTONE

New Book by Ruth Gruber: One of the most useful and informative books on Jewish travel to emerge in recent years is Jewish Heritage Travel: A Guide to East-Central Europe by Ruth Ellen Gruber. A veteran journalist and former chief UPI correspondent with multiple European postings, Gruber has taken sidetrips over the years to many varied sites of Jewish interest in Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Romania, Yugoslavia and Bulgaria. Her book provides a window into the world of European Jewish culture that the Nazis destroyed during World War II. (A revised version is due in September).

In September, publisher John Wiley & Sons plans to issue another book by Gruber, which she penned after returning to some of the places which fascinated her when researching the travel book. The new book is called Upon the Doorposts of Thy House: Jewish Life in East-Central Europe, Yesterday and Today.

The highly personalized volume reportedly contains a chapter about Prague, another about wine merchants and wonder rabbis and a third that chronicles the author's search for Lipot Baumhorn, the forgotten, turn-of-the-century architect of numerous magnificent synagogues in Hungary. As well, the book includes the chapter "Snowbound in Auschwitz," which deals with Gruber's confrontation with Holocaust-related issues. Another chapter deals with the problem of finding contemporary uses for abandoned Jewish buildings in Krakow and elsewhere.

Praise for the forthcoming volume has issued from high places. Abraham Foxman, director of the U.S. Anti-Defamation League, says Gruber has done a fine job in "re-creating for us the warmth and grandeur of Jewish life in pre-Holocaust Eastern and Central Europe." Sallyann Amdur Sack, editor of the genealogical journal Avotaynu, says Gruber "has a fine sensitivity to Jewish feeling about the European roots of our ancestors."

An American-born writer living in Italy, Gruber plans to travel in North America in the fall. According to my privileged sources, one or more community organizations in Toronto may jointly invite her to speak here during Holocaust Education Week in November.

Montreal Jewish Public Library: Like an intergalactic black hole, the Jewish Public Library of Montreal exerts a tremendous gravitational pull upon visitors who, once inside, may find it very hard to leave. Visiting there recently, I inspected its 125,000-volume collection and learned some of the reasons why it is considered a pivotal institution not only to the Jewish community but to the city's entire cosmopolitan sweep.

The library has almost 6,000 members who pay $45 annually ($500 for friends) for the privilege. It boasts well-stocked reference, children's and general circulation departments and offers books, tapes and other resources in French, English, Hebrew, Yiddish and Russian. Typically, its list of new acquisitions for July is many pages long. The JPL is currently automating to computer, no small task, since it maintains catalogs in French, English, Yiddish and Hebrew.

Many researchers are drawn to the JPL's rare books and its special collections of Jewish Canadiana and related archival material. It also has an outstanding collection of yizkor books, rivalling even the wonderful collection in Toronto's Robarts Library. I counted roughly 600 volumes, a good number of which the library holds in duplicate on separate shelves.

Claire Stern, head of public services, says the library's various lectures, film screenings, concerts and other events are well-attended. Montreal writer Mordecai Richler has spoken there, and Thomas Keneally, author of Schindler's List, is expected to speak off-premises on Oct. 30 during the library's Jewish Book Month.

More Montreal Musings: A recent innovation, the Montreal Museum Pass, permits entry into 17 major museums. Cost of a one-day pass is $12 for adults, $24 for families. For three days, the amounts are $25 and $50 respectively.

American artist Roy Lichtenstein is the subject of an intriguing retrospective at The Montreal of Fine Arts through Sept. 4. The museum consists of two buildings across from each other on Sherbrooke Street: the original historic museum (Canada's oldest, dating from 1912) and a modern building designed by Israeli-born architect Moshe Safdie.

Montrealer Stanley Asher conducted two different walking tours of historic Jewish Montreal in July. A third is set for August 21 at 10 a.m. Highlights include Mordecai Richler's neighbourhood, chassidic areas, Wilensky's restaurant, two bagel factories, a multi-ethnic radio station and the former Folkshule. Contact the Jewish Public Library, (514) 345-2627. VIA Rail's express train service between Toronto and Montreal is a convenient way of getting from downtown to downtown in four hours (or five, depending on the run). The one-way coach fare is $47 when purchased at least five days in advance. A one-way, first-class ticket, which includes a full-course meal and complimentary bar service, costs $115.

Montreal's World Film Festival unwinds Aug. 25 to Sept. 5.

Syria wants Golan back before peaceful relations

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — In what could be the first major breakthrough in the long-standing Israeli-Syrian deadlock, Syrian President Hafez Assad is reportedly moving forward with a peace plan of his own.

Damascus has reportedly proposed a phased Israeli pullback from all of the Golan Heights over two years in return for a full peace and normalization of relations.

According to the Syrian proposal, relations would be established only upon completion of the last phase of the withdrawal. Israel's position has been that full peace and normalization must come into effect before the final pullback, as was the case with the Sinai withdrawal under the terms of the 1979 peace treaty with Egypt.

According to the Israeli newspaper Davar, Assad made his proposal last week to U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher.

The report said Christopher subsequently conveyed the proposal to Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, who agreed to study it and offer a full Israeli response during Christopher's next shuttle trip to the region, set for some time in September.

This important development, according to the newspaper, contributed to Christopher's upbeat assessment to reporters of his visit to the region last week.

In his comments, Christopher said he foresaw real progress toward a breakthrough during his next round of Middle East shuttle diplomacy, which would be his fifth since May.

Rabin told his cabinet on Sunday there were "faint signs" of a new flexibility emanating from Syria. He did not elaborate, but his remark was immediately linked to the reports of the new Syrian proposal.

Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk al-Sharaa, meanwhile, sought to downplay these reports. He asserted during a visit to Cairo on Sunday that no two-year withdrawal compromise was on the table.

But Sharaa said his country's negotiations with Israel were seriously engaged in "all aspects" of peace.

The news of movement by Syria prompted urgent demands from the opposition Likud bloc over the weekend for the dissolution of the Knesset and the holding of new elections.

But the government brushed aside these calls, citing Rabin's pledge to bring any land-for-peace agreement with Syria to a national referendum before it is ratified.

According to the Davar report, the new Syrian proposal represents substantial movement by Assad on several key points:

Time differences

TEL AVIV — Israel will revert to standard time during the last weekend in August, more than two months before other countries in the Northern Hemisphere.

Israel's clocks will be set back one hour at midnight local time on Saturday night, August 27, 10 days before Rosh Hashanah.

The time change will allow ample time for morning prayers before the start of the normal workday. According to Jewish law, the morning service must begin after dawn.

Israeli clocks will thus be nine hours ahead of Pacific daylight (British Columbia) time; eight hours ahead of mountain daylight (Alberta) time; seven hours ahead of central daylight (Winnipeg) time; six hours ahead of eastern daylight (Quebec and most of Ontario) time; five hours ahead of Atlantic daylight (Maritime provinces) time; and 4½ hours ahead of clocks in Newfoundland.

The time differences will be in place until the end of October, when North America reverts to standard time. Time differentials will then be one hour more than those listed above.

Israel is now, and will remain, eight hours ahead of Saskatchewan, which stays on standard time year round.

Terrorist attacks threaten to stall talks with Palestinians

One dead, six wounded in two ambushes

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — Palestinian police made their first round of arrests of Hamas activists in the Gaza Strip last week, after Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin threatened to stall talks with the Palestinian Authority unless it took firm action against terrorists.

Rabin's warning came in the aftermath of two ambushes in the Gaza Strip on Sunday that left one Israeli dead and six wounded. In both incidents terrorists fired upon passing vehicles and fled into a Gaza refugee camp. The military wing of the Hamas claimed responsibility for the attacks.

"We don't see a serious effort on the part of the Palestinian Authority to deal with those who are trying to torpedo the agreement by staging terror attacks against Israelis," said Rabin on Monday.

"We will continue our talks (on early empowerment) with the Palestinians," he said. "But we will not continue with the implementation of the agreement unless we see a serious effort on the part of the Palestinian Authority to deal with known terror elements — something we have not seen until now."

Since the Palestinians assumed control of the Gaza Strip there have been 39 firearm attacks and no arrests, according to Brig.-Gen. Doron Almog, the commander of IDF forces in Gaza.

But following Sunday's attacks, some 20 leading Hamas activists were apprehended by Palestinian police, reportedly at the direct orders of PLO chairman Yasser Arafat. The sweep of arrests marked the first major operation conducted by Palestinian police against Hamas extremists.

Israeli leaders are waiting to see whether the confrontation marks a turning point in PLO-Hamas relations or whether the arrests are part of a "show" to appease an angry Israeli government and public.

"If the PLO wanted to control the Hamas it could do so without any difficulty," said Housing Minister Binyamin Ben-Eliezer. "It is just a matter of a decision on the part of the leadership."

"This is the major test for the Palestinian Authority," said Environment Minister Yossi Sarid. "If they cannot fight terror then many processes that we would like to continue with will come to a halt. The situation is intolerable."

Sunday's terror attacks have already delayed the implementation of one aspect of the Cairo accord: the scheduled opening of four "safe passage" routes between the Gaza Strip and Jericho intended for Palestinian traffic.

"I don't know when the routes will open now," said Police Minister Moshe Shahal. "It depends on the Palestinians' ability to fulfil their part of the Cairo accord."

Top Arafat aide Nabil Sha'ath strongly condemned Sunday's shootings, but said it would be premature to disarm the Hamas. "This must be done in the proper political atmosphere," he told Israel Television.

However, Yasser Abed Rabu, a leading PLO spokesman, disagreed. "Any weapons which are not legal should be seized by the Palestinian Authority," he said, adding that the Authority has a schedule for implementing that decision.

When the Palestinian police took over the Gaza Strip and Jericho, members of the military wing of the Hamas (Izzadin Kassam) refused to hand in their weapons, claiming that they needed them for self defence.

"The PLO does not want to curb terror entirely, but it doesn't want it to get out of hand either," said Dr. Hillel Frisch, a Hebrew University expert on the Palestinians.

"Too much terror will damage the peace process, slow down the transfer of power and have an adverse effect on the Palestinian economy," said Frisch. "The PLO knows this.

"On the other hand, the PLO doesn't want complete calm until a final settlement has been reached. They fear that too much quiet will make it look as though the Palestinians are content with an interim agreement," said Frisch during an interview with Israel Radio.

Rowlands launches campaign to combat racial intolerance

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Mayor June Rowlands' newly launched public education campaign aims to combat the spread of hatred and intolerance by more than a dozen neo-Nazi and white supremacist groups operating in the Toronto area.

Posters with the message "Hate . . . It's taught . . . Stop intelrance . . . Stop racism . . . Stop the hate" have been put up in 55 city bus shelters for the first phase of the campaign. The posters are going to be distributed to schools and public buildings, and lectures on how the groups recruit young people will start in September.

Local hate groups include the Heritage Front, Equal Rights for Whites, Northern Hammerskins, Resistance Records, the National Knights of the Ku Klux Klan, the Knights of the Invisible Empire of the Ku Klux Klan, Church of the Creator, Bonehead groups, White Aryan Youth, White Aryan Resistance, Aryan Resistance Movement, the Iron Guard and the Canadian Nazi Party.

At a recent press conference Rowlands, the chair of the Toronto mayor's committee on community and race relations, said hate groups prey on legitimate fears created by economic uncertainty and rapid changes in society and their "messages are particularly directed to white youth." She noted that they have been very active in certain high schools.

"These groups have had considerable success in the past couple of years in the recruitment of youth and alienated persons," she said, adding that they are using increasingly sophisticated methods to promote hatred. Recruitment methods she cited are widespread leafleting, telephone hotlines and rock concerts that feature music with racist lyrics.

Mayor calls for changes

Recently Rowlands alerted the mayors of Halifax, Victoria, Markham, Vaughan, Peterborough and Charlottetown who were in the process of launching a Nationalist Party of Canada European heritage week "without understanding the group behind it and what they were getting themselves into." The white-supremacist political party used a letter of support it obtained from Buckingham Palace to get the endorsements of the various cities.

Rowlands stressed that changes are needed to the Criminal Code for enhanced sentencing of hate-related crimes, improvements to the operation of the justice system and national standards to ensure appropriate investigation of hate crimes.

The committee's motion to that effect was passed by Toronto city council in 1992, and similar motions have since been approved by cities across Canada and the Federation of Canadian Municipalities. As a result, the federal government agreed to make changes to the criminal code in the future.

But changing laws doesn't necessarily change attitudes, Rowlands pointed out. Referring to the public education campaign, she said there is a need for education in the streets, so people can recognize when they are being subjected to a hate campaign, "in whatever form, regardless of how sophisticated it is."

Committee members attending the press conference included: Rodney Bobiwash of the Native Canadian Centre; Louis Lenkinski of the Canadian Jewish Congress; Sol Littman of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre; Karen Mock of the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith; Malka Rosenberg of the Ministry of Citizenship; Antoni Shelton of the Urban Alliance on Race Relations; and Marjorie Bell of the Canadian Human Rights Commission.

Abandoned van forces police to evacuate JCC

No bomb found in vehicle

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Over 100 people were evacuated from the Jewish Community Centre (JCC) North Y branch last Tuesday morning, when the Metropolitan Toronto Police bomb squad was called in to investigate a suspicious van parked in front of the building's main entrance.

While a bomb expert in blue coveralls inspected the grey Plymouth Voyageur before pronouncing it "clean," four ambulance vehicles, two fire department vehicles and two police cars stood by.

The van, which had been reported stolen two days earlier, was noticed by building security staff at approximately 10 a.m. The area was cordonned off by 10:30 and the front section of the Bathurst Street building, consisting of offices and a rotunda, was evacuated immediately, said Bernie Farber of Canadian Jewish Congress, who was on-site to oversee security.

"We evacuated the entire building as a necessary precaution," said Farber. Complete evacuation took place under the recommendation and guidance of emergency authorities once they arrived on the scene, he explained.

"It's an unusual place to park a stolen vehicle, and because of the situation around the world, we took precautions," said police Sgt. Al Nowitsky.

The bomb scare followed three recent car bombings of Jewish targets — the July 18 car bombing of the Jewish community headquarters in Buenos Aires, Argentina, and subsequent attacks in London, England, on the Israeli Embassy and on the offices of the Joint Israel Appeal. A Panamanian commuter plane was also bombed last month. Twelve Jewish passengers were killed.

"There was no panic [at the JCC]. Everyone walked out in an orderly way," said Mark Rubinstein, 27. Along with an estimated 100 to 200 others, Rubinstein was sent outside to the tennis courts behind the building.

Albert Bleiwas, 80, was doing laps on the indoor track when he heard the fire alarm. "At first I thought it was a false alarm, but the staff told us it wasn't. I even left my towel there," he said.

Some JCC members left the building in bathing suits, wrapping towels around themselves against the 19 degree Celsius weather.

"What's a real shocker is that no one thought it could happen in Toronto," said Rubinstein. "It gives you a feeling we're not so insulated from it."

"People don't want to take this," said Michael Goldberg, 26.

By 12:30, emergency vehicles had left. Only the grey van awaited its owner.

"Thankfully, it was nothing," said a relieved Farber, "[but] it was a good test of our procedures."

Nationalist Party fails to sway Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Corespondent

WINNIPEG — The Toronto-based Nationalist Party has struck out in its attempt to have the City of Winnipeg proclaim European Heritage Week sometime in September.

The neo-Nazi group had written mayors across the country asking them to commemorate the contributions of European culture and heritage to Canada's multi-ethnic mosaic.

The letter arrived at Winnipeg City Hall in early August (while Mayor Susan Thompson was away on holiday) along with copies of proclamations from the cities of Halifax and Victoria and the request was refused.

The mayor of Victoria rescinded that city's proclamation after receiving a letter from Toronto's mayor, June Rowlands, explaining the Nationalist Party's true purpose.

Cities reject Heritage Week

TORONTO — The mayors of Halifax and Victoria last week scrambled to rescind proclamations declaring a European Heritage Week in their cities.

The city council of Vaughan, just north of Metropolitan Toronto, voted unanimously to rescind its earlier heritage week proclamation.

The moves came in the wake of an alert sounded by Toronto mayor June Rowlands, who informed her colleagues that the white supremacist Nationalist Party was the group promoting European Heritage Week.

The Nationalist Party is headed by Donald Andrews and Robert Smith, both of whom were convicted in 1985 for promoting hatred against non-whites.

Rowlands told The CJN that she had written to Prime Minister Jean Chretien on March 31 warning him of the Nationalist Party's proposal and more recently had contacted mayors in the Toronto area to alert them as well.

"Certain municipalities didn't know what they were getting involved in," she said of the proclamations.

Rowlands said the proposed European Heritage Week was scheduled for Oct. 9-15, around the time of municipal elections. "This is a means to recruit membership. I think that's what it's all about," she said.

Vaughan councillor Bernie Green said the Nationalist Party proposal "looked very innocent to city clerks, but the source of the material was not innocent."

The Nationalist Party's name sounds very much like Mel Hurtig's National Party, he pointed out. "There's even a letter of encouragement from [Buckingham Palace]. I'm sure they've been deceived.

"I'm indignant and angry that neo-Nazis are trying such a route," Green said, adding that the Nationalist Party would likely use the proclamation to denigrate other groups and assert the superiority of Europeans.

Bernie Farber, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, said the Nationalist Party is attempting to remake itself. "They are painting an image for themselves different from past Nazis. It's the David Duke syndrome. This is an attempt to make a comeback. . . [and] a lot of people have been manipulated by the ruse."

Sol Littman of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre pointed out that the timing of the heritage week was significant. "This is precisely the route the British fascists have been taking and it has worked remarkably well in France," he said.

Founder of Heritage Front received funds from CSIS

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A published report in the Sunday edition of the Toronto Sun claims that one of the founding members of the white supremacist Heritage Front has been on the payroll of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) since 1989.

The report that CSIS informant Grant Bristow helped create the Heritage Front startled Jewish organizations, which called on Solicitor General Herb Gray to look into the allegations.

If true, the revelations raise the question of why the spy agency, which is mandated to collect intelligence about organizations that pose a danger to Canadian society, was backing one of the creators of just such a group.

Citing unnamed "intelligence scources" for much of the report, the Sun story claims that Bristow was a paid informant for CSIS in 1989, before the Heritage Front was founded. Those sources indicate that Bristow was paid between $50,000 and $60,000 in 1993 alone.

Bristow paid for organizing trips made by Heritage Front leaders to Ottawa, Montreal, Vancouver and Victoria, the story alleges.

The article also indicates that Bristow was behind a harassment campaign against opponents of the white supremacist group.

Quoting former Heritage Front member Elisse Hategan, the report states that Bristow handed out the phone numbers of anti-racist organizers and told Front members to call the people at work and at home.

Bristow refused to comment about his alleged ties to CSIS. "I'm bound by an official secrets act too," the Sun reported him saying.

"We were startled [by the article] and it caused deep concern," said Hal Joffe, national chair of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress. "If the reports are true, then it's scandalous.

Hal Joffe

"It raises deep concerns over the methods that CSIS allegedly used, because it may have backfired," he added.

"We understand that law enforcement agencies must infiltrate groups like the Heritage Front to gather information since they are considered a threat to national security. However it is our belief that a CSIS informant should not be in the business of providing funds to establish a neo-Nazi framework in the country," Joffe said.

"I'm not sure that we should speculate that what CSIS did, they did with malice," he continued.

Racist agitator Wolfgang Droege, who along with Bristow and Gerry Lincoln founded the Heritage Front, had just returned to Canada from the United States and CSIS may have wanted Bristow to keep tabs on Droege's activities, Joffe suggested. Bristow may then have gotten "out of control," he added.

Joffe said Congress is writing to Gray asking him to look into the case and determine whether CSIS acted within Canadian law.

The solicitor general can expect a second letter from Sol Littman, Canadian representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre.

Littman said, "We recognize the necessity to infiltrate groups that are conspiratorial, violent and anti-democratic; nevertheless we can see no sense in creating new neo-Nazi, racist organizations so that one may have someone to spy on."

The solicitor general should indicate whether the Sun story is true and whether "Bristow operated in outlaw fashion or under the control of his CSIS handler," Littman said. "If so, we want to know what game CSIS is playing in the field of race relations.

"Are they stirring things up to create worse race relations to justify their existence?" he asked.

The solicitor general's office did not return calls from The CJN.

When contacted in Ottawa, CSIS spokesman Gaetan Blais said, "It's our established policy not to comment on reports in the news media." He said the legislation establishing CSIS prevents the spy organization from confirming or denying specific aspects of its operations.

However, he did say that CSIS's mandate includes "investigating groups that constitute a threat to Canada," adding also that the spy agency "is concerned about right wing extremism in general."

Honeywell slaps $1 million construction lien on Toronto JCC

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The hole out of which the Jewish Community Centre (JCC) must climb to become financially stable got a little deeper recently — almost $1 million deeper.

On July 25, Honeywell Limited placed a construction lien on the cash-strapped JCC, adding to the centre's already monumental financial woes.

The $990,425 lien came as a total surprise to the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, said Federation chair Bernie Ghert. "It certainly makes the situation more complicated. It's another liability that will have to be dealt with in some way."

Honeywell's lien came only days after the Federation and the JCC agreed to a new bailout arrangement, part of which will see the Federation lend the JCC $4.5 million to go towards payment of the centre's $9.5 million bank debt.

Ghert said that when the Federation's officers voted for the bailout plan, they did not know the extent of the Honeywell claim.

"We knew [the JCC was involved in] an energy-saving project. We didn't know they weren't paying for it," Ghert said.

In previous interviews, Ghert has said that every week brings new revelations of the depth of the JCC's financial difficulties.

"It's still not clear what the totals are that the JCC owes to its creditors," he said again last week.

The lien will likely push back completion of the bailout plan from its originally scheduled closing date in late August to sometime in early to mid-September, Ghert said.

He discounted suggestions the lien could scuttle the plan, saying only that "it makes it more difficult. It doesn't mean we're going to [walk away]."

Sharon Bacal, one of a three-person committee overseeing JCC operations, said that in October 1993, the JCC entered into an agreement with Honeywell and Hitachi for the program.

Honeywell registered the lien when Hitachi, which was to finance the program, withdrew the funding over concerns that the Federation bailout of the JCC might not go ahead.

Honeywell then registered the lien. Bacal said management believes that Honeywell will lift the lien when the deal with the Federation closes. Under terms of the contract, Honeywell will then be paid out of energy savings over a period of about six years.

RCMP seeking witnesses to World War II executions

OTTAWA — The war crimes and special investigations section of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) is seeking witnesses to a series of executions carried out during World War II.

The executions took place at or near Pinsk in the Republic of Belarus, formerly known as Byelorussia, by members of the German SS as well as members of Schutzmannschaft Rayon Pinsk East. The killings occurred in August 1941, March 1942 and between Oct. 29, 1942 and Nov. 1, 1942.

In pursuit of its investigations, the RCMP is requesting the cooperation of persons who may have direct knowledge of the events or who can assist in locating anyone who could provide such information.

Anyone who can assist the investigation is asked to contact the RCMP directly by telephoning collect to (613) 990-8467 and asking for Investigator Corporal Ken Lavoie or by writing to: The Commanding Officer, 'A' Division, Royal Canadian Mounted Police, 155 McArthur Ave., Vanier, Ont., K1A 0R4, Attention: War crimes and special investigation section. All information will be treated as confidential.

Alternatively, those with information may contact Bernie Farber of Canadian Jewish Congress at (416) 635-2883, who will serve as a liaison with the RCMP.

Revenue Canada to reject 'kosher' tax deductions

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Revenue Canada will implement measures to ensure that its offices detect and disallow income tax claims for deductions for the purchase of kosher products.

National Revenue Minister David Anderson made the announcement in the wake of news stories that appeared in the Ottawa Sun that Revenue Canada had allowed such claims for two residents of Winchester, Ont.

A tax preparer in the Eastern Ontario community told the Sun that two of his clients had stapled statements to their returns claiming $300 deductions for expenses paid in purchasing kosher food and other products. The claims, he added, were accepted by Revenue Canada.

But a spokesman for the tax-gathering authority said that if such claims were accepted, and he had no other evidence they were, it was simply because of human error.

"Revenue Canada does not and has never agreed with the points or ideas regarding a kosher food tax," said Michel Cleroux, chief of media relations for the ministry. "It is completely without foundation of any kind in law."

The claims that citizens are paying a special tax when they purchase kosher products are aimed at defaming the Jewish community, said Canadian Jewish Congress president Irving Abella.

"The [purpose] of anti-Semites who circulate such material is to have members of the public believe that Canadians are paying higher prices for foods labelled kosher and, as a result, paying a 'kosher tax' to the Jewish community," Abella stated in a letter to Anderson.

Cleroux told The CJN that Revenue Canada alerted its district offices last April about the possibility that claims for a kosher deduction may be made. The warnings were made in the normal course of events to inform its offices about the kosher food claim and about other bogus deductions, he said, adding it is possible that district offices rejected several other such claims.

Revenue Canada processes 20 million returns in a few weeks; so it is possible that some claims were accepted in the initial assessment. However, it is likely that they would have been caught on subsequent reviews, particularly because they were not accompanied by the necessary receipts, Cleroux said.

Steven Shulman, assistant director of community relations for Congress, said the claims for kosher tax deductions that were included in the Winchester tax returns resemble those circulated by an organization in British Columbia in the mid-1980s and then again last year.

Although a link between the British Columbia organization and the material stapled to the Winchester tax returns has not been established, the B.C. group claims that, whenever consumers purchase kosher products, they are making a donation to a Jewish fund. Therefore, they assert, they are entitled to claim a charitable deduction.

Shulman suggested that some people who made the claim for a kosher product deduction "may have been duped by this and others may be anti-Semitic."

Congress has called on the minister to prosecute those who knowingly attempted to defraud the tax authorities.

In a news release, Anderson stated that "any claims which my department reassesses will be subject to interest and the taxpayer may also have to pay applicable penalties. Claims which Revenue Canada suspects to be fraudulent will be referred to our special investigation division for further investigation and possible prosecution."

Eva Barash Dicker and Hilda Barash

Jewish deaf strive to maintain connections to their religion

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Eva Barash Dicker, 57, was raised in a traditional Jewish family, but not a typical one. As hearing children of deaf parents, she and her brother often served as their parents' link to the hearing Jewish world.

Barash Dicker remembers sitting in shul as a young child in Madison, Wisconson, where she would use sign language to interpret the service to her father. The picture she paints is tarnished, however, by the memory of an usher — someone acquainted with her father — who would approach the pair, watch them, and tell her, "Stop talking in shul. Stop it!"

"We've come a long way," said Barash Dicker at the recent National Congress of Jewish Deaf (NCJD) convention, "but we have a long way to travel yet." Barash Dicker, a family therapist in Milwaukee who specializes in deaf and hard of hearing issues, led a convention workshop on Growing Up Jewishly with Deaf Parents. The workshop focused on transmitting Jewish values.

One workshop participant noted that her deafness had been "a source of shame" in her family. As a young adult, she "dropped Judaism" and reclaimed it only when she met other deaf Jews and found that "there was a way in."

In contrast, Barash Dicker's mother, Hilda Barash, now a sprightly 79-year-old, has always had a strong connection to Judaism. As Hilda watched her daughter sign, Barash Dicker explained that her mother was the "driving force" behind the family's Jewish home.

Hilda was deafened at about age 6 by a high fever. The family immigrated from Russia a few years later, and Hilda attended a regular public school in Madison, finishing her education just short of high school graduation.

Because she lived at home while attending school, the Jewish aspects of her life "became part of her fabric — the inside of her — and became a model for her own home later on," her daughter said.

Abe Barash, Barash Dicker's late father, immigrated to Fond du Lac, Wisconson, at age 11. After an unsatisfactory stint at a school for hearing children, he attended a Wisconson residential school for the deaf.

Abe, like his wife, was born in Russia and became deaf following a fever he suffered as an infant. A major factor for both families in their decision to immigrate was the knowledge that America offered educational and vocational opportunities for the deaf.

As Barash Dicker recounts it, Abe's mother was terrified that the family would be turned away at Ellis Island, New York's historic immigration site, because of Abe's deafness. Her fears were allayed after the personable boy easily passed an intelligence test in which he had to fit puzzle pieces together.

Abe's Hebrew education began and ended in Russia when his Uncle Motl tried to teach him the Aleph Bet. The child was able to approximate the sounds of aleph and bet, but became frustrated and angry when he failed to understand how the initial "g" of gimel was pronounced. Because the sound is made in the back of the throat, it can't be lipread.

"It brings tears to my eyes to think of how much he must have wanted to learn that, and how much his family must have wanted him to learn that," said Barash Dicker. Because of his deafness, Abe did not have a bar mitzvah.

At the residential school, Abe lost touch with Jewish life, except for two visits home each year — a "heartache" for his mother, who placed tremendous value both on education and Judaism.

Communication was obstacle at first

Abe and Hilda's first meeting was arranged by their parents, both sets of whom felt strongly about their children making a Jewish match. Although their deafness and family backgrounds linked them, communication was an obstacle at first. Hilda knew virtually no sign language, while Abe communicated almost exclusively by sign.

"They just sort of looked at each other, and fell in love," said Barash Dicker, as her mother looked on and smiled broadly at the memory.

They married in 1935 when Hilda was 18 and Abe was 19. Because neither of them could read Hebrew and because sign was not accepted as a language at the time, they were not permitted to be married in their synagogue, said Barash Dicker. They were married by a rabbi in the more secular Workman's Circle building.

Following the wedding, Abe built up his own shoe repair business, first in Fond du Lac, then in Madison, where they eventually settled. Hilda concentrated on establishing a Jewish home.

"One of the beauties of the Jewish religion is that it really does appeal to the senses," Barash Dicker noted. "All you have to do is think about Sukkot. People smell and handle the etrog, which looks like a lemon. The sukkah itself gives [visual pleasure], when you look up through the branches, enjoying nature."

The Havdallah spice box and — of course — Jewish food were also mentioned as Jewish sensory experiences.

"Our first memories were of smelling challah on Friday afternoon and having to clean the house and make everything shiny," Barash Dicker said. "We knew there was something special about that day.

"Even though my parents had a much stronger affiliation with what we would call deaf culture [than they had with the Jewish community], they took a lot of pride in everything my brother and I accomplished Jewishly. That helped us," she said.

Along with her brother Harvey, she attended junior services and a weekly "Shabbat club," in which her parents took great interest. "They always asked us what we did there. They didn't understand everything, but that positive feeling and encouragement were important."

Barash Dicker was saddened when, as an adult, she met deaf Jews who had converted to Christianity because they felt "there was no place for [them]" in Judaism.

Acceptance within the hearing Jewish community has grown, Barash Dicker noted. Her parents' synagogue, for example, has established a fund to pay for interpreters. By the time her father died in 1987, a number of people in the congregation had begun to learn sign language. An elderly man used to fingerspell "Shabbat Shalom" when Abe entered the shul. "It made my dad feel part of it," Barash Dicker said.

• • •

Barash Dicker and her brother are co-authors of a book about their father's life. Our Father Abe: The story of a deaf shoe repairman, published in 1991, is a personal account with a universal message.

Abe Barash overcame hardship to exert a strong positive influence in his family and community. His son and daughter tell his story with a sensitivity that is difficult to forget.

The book can be ordered at a cost of $15 (U.S.) from Abar Press, 205 N. Prospect, Madison, WI 53705.

It's a long way from Daliat el-Carmel to Hay River in Canada's Northwest Territories, but a VIP delegation from the Israeli town recently made the trip to take part in a twinning ceremony that linked the two communities. Seen here are Akram Hassoun, deputy mayor of Daliat el-Carmel (left), his wife Effat (second from left), mayor Fahmi Halbie (right) and his wife Wafika.

Northwest Territories town twins with Israeli community

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It was a scene typical of many a long, soft summer day in Canada's north. Bobbing up and down in a small boat in a lake brimming with fish, it seemed the neophyte fishermen just couldn't miss.

At one point, all four hooked onto pickerel at the same time and it was all the guide could do to help them land the fighting fish.

Nothing too unusual in that scene, except the four were not city slickers flown in from some American megalopolis, but diplomatic VIPs come to the remote town of Hay River, N.W.T., 1,300 km north of Edmonton, from the somewhat exotic locale of Daliat el-Carmel, Israel.

The four visitors, Daliat el-Carmel mayor Fahmi Halbie and his wife Wafika, and deputy mayor Akram Hassoun and his wife Effat, were in Hay River and its environs to open a new chapter in relations between the two communities. During their stay earlier this month, a proclamation was read outside the Hay River Town Hall, officially twinning the two municipalities.

Like dozens of other twinning agreements that have linked Israeli centres with towns around the world, the agreement is geared to promoting investment, inaugurating cultural exchanges and creating bonds of friendship between the communities.

What brought the Druze village of Daliat el-Carmel (population 13,000) together with Hay River (population 3,200) was the inspiration of Hay River resident Jack Cooper, one of the community's few Jewish residents.

Cooper said in a telephone interview that he got the idea while reading an article on the northern Israeli town of Metulla in The CJN.

"That gave me the idea that Israel is coming along and I thought, what a good time to twin."

Cooper, a former town councillor, brought his idea to the council last January and they gave him the green light to pursue it.

A high school teacher, Cooper got in touch with the Israeli consulate in Toronto, which passed on the request to Israel.

Consul General Dror Zeigerman picks up the story there. When Israeli officials learned that the majority of Hay River's population were from native minorities, they decided to twin it with the Druze village near Haifa, he said.

Zeigerman visited the Northwest Territories in June, spending time in both Hay River and the capital, Yellowknife, where he met N.W.T. government leader, Nellie Curnoyea.

He believes both sides can benefit from trade, particularly in regard to diamonds. The Northwest Territories produces the precious stones while Israel is renowned for shaping and cutting them.

In addition, he said, Israel could prove to be a lucrative market for one of Hay River's main exports, whitefish.

Added to that are the cultural, educational and youth exchanges that could result from the twinning, and both sides can see many benefits, he said.

Cooper said the Druze delegation was "treated royally" during their visit. They were given the grand tour, including a ride in a small plane over nearby waterfalls and lakes. They visited a Dene reserve where they were presented with unique beaver hats and bags made with moosehair tufting dyed to look like flowers and animals.

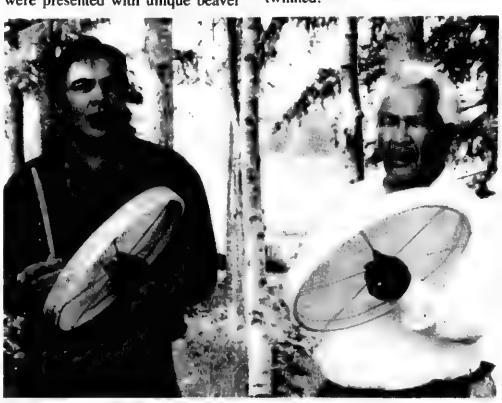
Many citizens had them over for informal backyard barbecues and of course, there was the fishing trip.

"They caught a lot of fish and they didn't want to go in," Cooper said. Even the insect life cooperated. They stayed away in droves.

Cooper, a native of Tillsonburg, Ont., who moved with his wife Josephine, a native of London, to Hay River 18 years ago, said the trip proved to be an education for himself and the people of Hay River. A longtime Young Judaea member as a youth, Cooper said he and the residents of Hay River "had their eyes opened."

In addition to learning about the Druze sect, they discovered that the Middle East is developing quickly and those who are there first will benefit the most, he said.

In November, stage two of the twinning process will be completed when a Hay River delegation, likely including mayor Ron Hill and representatives of the Dene reserve, which runs a construction company, will reciprocate the visit by travelling to Israel to see the Carmel community with which they have been twinned.



A visit to a native village was part of the Israeli VIPs' itinerary.

Hussein set to visit Israel, says newsletter

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Jordan's King Hussein is planning to attend prayers at Al-Aksa Mosque this Friday to mark Mawled an-Nabawi, the anniversary of the birth of the Prophet Mohammed, according to the London-based daily newsletter Mideast Mirror.

The newsletter's Jordan correspondent quotes sources in Amman as saying Hussein would make a "private, unofficial visit" to underscore the fact that he "does not recognize Israeli sovereignty over Jerusalem."

To reinforce the point, the sources said that while Hussein will be accompanied by members of his family, his party will not include officials.

The sources also noted that the king would be received by Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert, but not by Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin or other government officials.

The king will travel to Jerusalem by helicopter which will, according to the sources, land "near the mosque."

The visit is expected to further exacerbate tensions between the PLO and Jordan, which was granted a "special role" over Muslim holy places in the Washington Declaration signed by Rabin and Hussein last month.

In an apparent attempt to limit the damage, the sources stressed that the visit "does not reflect any change in Jordan's position on the need for Israel to withdraw from East Jerusalem in keeping with UN Security Council Resolution 242."

The Washington Declaration, added the sources, was no more than a "recognition of the status quo" under which Jordan takes care of Muslim holy places.

The London-based newsletter also reported that Palestinian official Faisal Husseini, who visited Amman last week for talks on relations between Jordan and Israel, was not received by Hussein, Crown Prince Hassan or any senior Jordanian officials.

In a related development, Jordanian commentator Fahd Fanek accused the Palestinians of attempting to drag the Saudis into the dispute over Jerusalem.

Writing in the Jordanian newspaper al-Ra'i on Friday, Fanek said the PLO had called on Saudi Arabia's King Fahd to pump $42 million a year into Jerusalem — a sum that could not be matched by Jordan — ostensibly to "rehabilitate houses in the city so they would not be deserted by their inhabitants."

"The PLO might be trying to bring [King Fahd] into the matter just to spite Jordan," wrote Fanek.

In a carefully modulated article, he noted that Jordan "is not demanding anything new but only safeguarding the role it has played through the awkaf [Muslim religious trusts] since 1967."

He added that "the present Jordanian role is not at the expense of the PLO, self-rule or the political fate of Jerusalem."

Last Thursday, Faisal Husseini, in charge of Jerusalem affairs for the Palestinian Authority, said that he advised King Hussein and other Arab leaders "not to visit eastern Jerusalem as long as it is under Israeli occupation."

Husseini, speaking after meeting with a group of Western diplomats at Orient House, added that Jerusalem was no different from the rest of the territories occupied by Israel in 1967. No matter what Israel thinks, he said, Jerusalem will always be Palestinian territory.

Rabin denies Iraq contacts

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin last Sunday flatly denied that Israel had any contacts with Iraq.

Rabin first slammed reports about "quiet" contacts with Iraq and Iran in last Sunday's cabinet meeting.

The cabinet's formal statement said: "The prime minister sharply denied reports of so-called contacts with Iran and Iraq. The prime minister made clear that Israel supports the U.S. policy towards Iran and Iraq. Nobody is authorized by the government to hold such contacts with these states, and the government has no intention to have such contacts."

Israeli officials suspect that Iraq, desperate to have four-year-old international sanctions against it lifted, would try a similar gambit this week, just as it did during its war with Iran.

There were also unconfirmed reports last week of a PLO representative with close ties to Baghdad seeking an Israeli interlocutor in recent months.

Other reports said that a few weeks ago, an Iraqi businessmen sought out a senior Israeli defence ministry official. This official, while holding a preliminary discussion, reportedly refused ongoing contact.

Rabin stressed that Israel fully supported the United States' policies towards Iraq and Iran, adding that it would be "a grave mistake" not to side with Washington and its western allies.

Iraq denied the Israeli television report suggesting it had made peace overtures towards Israel through a third party.

Syria proposes peace plan

• Syria accepts the Israeli demand for a full demilitarization of all the land that Israel vacates on the Golan.
• Syria no longer demands an equal demilitarization by Israel, but will make do with a "symbolic" demilitarization in Israel's north. In the 1974 disengagement accord brokered by then Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, which is still in effect, Syria and Israel agreed on provisions calling for parallel but non-equal limitation of forces along the disengagement line.
• Syria is demanding a two-year withdrawal schedule, instead of the five years suggested by Israel or the four years reportedly proposed by the United States. According to Davar, Syria fears that if a Likud government is elected in November 1996, the new leadership may not implement an agreement reached by Rabin's, present Labor-led government.
• On the question of whether Israel is to withdraw to the international border or to the June 4, 1967 line, Assad reportedly proposes that this be left to top-level discussions between himself and Rabin.

Syria has previously insisted on the June 4 line, but Israel has made it clear that it will not agree to give up its foothold all around Lake Kinneret, which it claims as its rightful territory according to the international demarcation in force under the British Mandate.

The international line also places the strategically important Banias spring and the Hamat Gader springs under Israeli sovereignty.

The Syrian proposal, according to Davar, accepts the idea of an American or other international or multinational peace force on the Golan after Israel's withdrawal.

Assad reportedly has offered little by way of new flexibility on the subject of Lebanon. He demands a total Israeli withdrawal from the security zone in the south and a recognition by the United States and Israel of Syria's special status in Lebanon, where Damascus is the leading power broker.

Assad reportedly told Christopher at their August 7 meeting that he would like to see an agreement with Israel concluded before the end of the year.

Iranian diplomats named in Argentinian bombing

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUENOS AIRES — Argentine President Carlos Menem last week called for the expulsion of Iran's ambassador to Argentina after a judge issued arrest warrants for four Iranian diplomats wanted in connection with the July 18 bombing of the Jewish communal headquarters here.

But Menem, speaking to a radio interviewer on August 10, said the final decision regarding the expulsion should rest with the Foreign Ministry.

Menem made the statement after federal Judge Juan Jose Galeano decided to issue warrants for the four diplomats, whose current whereabouts are unknown.

Galeano has been spearheading the investigation into the bombing that killed 99 people and left more than 200 wounded.

The four Iranians were identified as Ahmad Allameh Falsafi, Mahvash Monsef Gholamreza, Akbar Parvaresh and Abbas Zarrabi Khorrasani, all of whom reportedly worked at the Iranian Embassy in Buenos Aires.

Galeano issued the warrants based on the testimony of an Iranian refugee, Monousheh Moatamer, who is currently in Caracas, Venezuela, under the protection of the UN high commissioner for refugees.

Moatamer has been variously described as a former secretary in Iran's Ministry of Culture and as a high official in the Iranian secret service, before fleeing Teheran a month ago.

Galeano's findings were criticized as lacking concrete evidence by Ruben Beraja, president of the DAIA, the Jewish communal umbrella organization whose offices were among those destroyed in the bomb blast.

The judge's finding "ratifies Iran's participation, but has no solid elements (of evidence)," Beraja said.

The Foreign Ministry's second-in-command, Fernando Petrella, said that the Supreme Court would have to determine whether Galeano had a sufficiently strong case to warrant an international manhunt for the four missing diplomats.

Israeli and American officials have blamed the Iranian-backed Hezbollah movement for the bombing.

Another Lebanon-based group, known as the Supporters of God, has taken responsibility for the terrorist attack. Little is known about the group, but it is believed to be closely associated with Hezbollah.

Argentiniane officials had spoken of the possibility of cutting off relations with Iran, but the threat was later withdrawn out of fear of reprisals.

Summoning the Argentine charge d'affairs in Teheran, Iranian officials strongly protested the issuance of the warrants. Argentina withdrew its ambassador to Iran shortly after the July 18 blast.

According to Iran's official news agency, the four wanted in Argentina are currently in Iran. Three of them, the agency stated, had not served at the Iranian Embassy in Buenos Aires for years, and the fourth had been in Argentina on an official visit in December, but has not returned there since.

Victims' families receive help

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUENOS AIRES — Though most of the world's attention has shifted away from the deadly explosion that rocked Argentina's Jewish community last month, the families of the victims are as focused as ever on the tragedy.

The Buenos Aires Association of Psychology has been providing counseling to the families of the 99 individuals who perished, as well as to the lucky survivors of the July 18 blast that ripped through the seven-story building housing the Jewish community headquarters.

"One of the most common symptoms we find is paralysis, a lack of reaction," Alicia Gamondi, the coordinator of the association, said of the survivors. "In these situations, there is no warning, nothing to prepare them for what is about to happen.

"We have had many cases with nightmares, which is a way of expressing anguish. Also many have felt pain and become ill, thus physically revealing the tremendous impact" the bombing had on them, Gamondi added.

In the wake of the blast, AMIA also provided psychologists, doctors, rabbis and priests to help the victims' relatives.

These professionals were with the relatives when they were informed that a loved one had died, when they went to the city morgue to identify bodies, and when they returned home to mourn their loss.

Among the families continuing to mourn is the family of Noemi Reisfeld.

She was laid to rest in a tomb in section 121 at a local Jewish cemetery. Written on the tombstone were these simple words: "Noemi Reisfeld, Dead at 36."

Reisfeld was among the 68 Jewish victims of the terrorist bombing that also claimed the lives of 31 non-Jews.

Before the explosion, Reisfeld had worked at the social assistance department of the AMIA, the Jewish community's 100-year-old main social service agency, where she helped the aged and the handicapped.

In 1976, when the military dictatorship was in power in Argentina, Reisfeld had to leave the country because of her political views. She lived in Israel and in Mexico, got married and had two daughters. She returned to Buenos Aires when democracy was restored.

Life was not easy for Reisfeld. She was an employee in a government office, and in the evening attended university to become a social worker. She sold clothes on weekends to help make ends meet.

In spite of her financial difficulties, she maintained Jewish traditions and managed to send her children to a good Jewish school.

Following her graduation five years ago, she started her work at AMIA, where those she helped were later to be among the mourners at her funeral.

The children of the victims, in particular, have been under great emotional strain in the weeks since the blast occurred.

Gamondi said her organization has been organizing meetings with the children to give them a chance to talk openly about their feelings.

Among those being helped by AMIA psychologists is 22-year-old Nora Faigelson, who could well have been on the list of casualties.

She had lost her job on the Friday before the explosion. On the fateful day of the blast, she was at an employment office on the fourth floor of the Jewish community building.

After she left the office, Faigelson pressed the button to call the elevator. After two minutes had elapsed and the elevator still had not come, she started walking down the stairs. That was when the explosion ripped the building apart.

Some 20 hours passed before someone found her wandering the streets of Buenos Aires. She remembered neither her home address nor how she had gotten to where she was.

Faigelson, who had been on the list of those missing, now has little recollection of what happened when the bomb went off.

"After the explosion, a man signaled to me that I should follow him. So I did, trying to protect my head with my hands," she said recently.

Today, recovering at home from the state of shock she suffered, she is still at a loss to explain what happened. An AMIA psychiatrist and a doctor are assisting her on the road to recovery.

Fate was on Nora's side because the elevator was slow to arrive. But others, like the Velazquez family, were not so lucky.

They lived across the street from the community headquarters, and by chance the mother and one of the children were having breakfast by the window when the bomb went off. The explosion put an end to their lives.

The News in Brief

Hebron Observers Go Home

TEL AVIV — With its three-month mission completed, the international observer force that was dispatched to Hebron in the spring officially took its leave of the troubled West Bank town last week.

About 100 members of the force flew home, leaving behind a skeleton staff to sell off its equipment or donate it to local charities.

Lt. Col. Bjarno Sorensen, a member of the Danish army who served as spokesman for the force — known officially as the Temporary International Presence in Hebron — said Palestine Liberation Organization Chairman Yasser Arafat had asked for an extension of the force's mission, but Israeli officials had rejected any extension.

Sorensen added that the force would not have remained, even if both sides had requested it, unless Israel and the Palestinians agreed to give the force more powers.

Moscow Shul Being Rebuilt

MOSCOW — Russians, Israelis, Americans and Argentineans participated recently at groundbreaking ceremonies for an ambitious new building to replace a synagogue destroyed by fire late last year.

"Our goal is to create not just a synagogue but a community center," said Rabbi Berel Lazar, the head rabbi of the synagogue, which is run by the Chabad movement of the Lubavitch Chasidim. "This is urgent, and we're turning to Jewish people from all over the world for support."

The new building will rise from the site of the remains of the Marina Roscha Synagogue, which was built in 1926 and devastated by a fire late in December 1993.

The cause of the fire remains unknown. It is widely believed to have been caused by either arson or faulty wiring, but a final answer has not yet been provided by fire investigators.

New U.S. Ambassador To Israel

WASHINGTON — Martin Indyk, the Clinton administration's point man on Middle East issues and a former American Israel Public Affairs Committee official, will be tapped as the next U.S. ambassador to Israel, according to White House and American Jewish sources.

Indyk, who currently serves as the National Security Council Adviser on the Middle East, would become the first Jewish ambassador to Israel.

He would replace Ambassador Edward Djerejian, who recently left the United States Embassy in Tel Aviv, after serving only seven months in the post, to head a public policy institute at Rice University in Texas.

Known as a staunch supporter of Israel, Indyk served as the founding executive director of the influential Washington Institute for Near East Policy.

He has served on the administration's team for the Middle East peace talks and is, perhaps, best known for his strategy for containing Iran and Iraq through strong U.S. policy against each nation.

Germany Sets Up Office In Jericho

TEL AVIV — Greece and Holland have announced plans to follow the lead of Germany, which has established diplomatic representation in the Palestinian autonomous area of Jericho.

A German liaison office was recently opened in Jericho, with the task of monitoring the Palestinian authority's use of Germany's financial grant to the autonomous Gaza Strip and Jericho regions.

The Greek Foreign Ministry and the Dutch Foreign Ministry also announced that their countries would also soon be setting up liaison offices in Jericho for the same purpose.

Israel, Ghana Renew Ties

JERUSALEM — Israel and Ghana renewed diplomatic relations last week after a 21-year hiatus, Foreign Ministers Shimon Peres and Obed Asamoa announced in a joint communique.

Ghana, a western African country with a population of 15.5 million, severed ties with Israel along with most black African countries in the aftermath of the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

However, the two countries maintained links even in difficult times. Ghana was the first decolonized black African country to establish relations with Israel in the late 1950s, and helped Israel forge links with other African countries at that time.

Even after ties were severed, Ghana agreed that Israel could maintain an interest section in the Swiss Embassy there for the next 17 years.

Many Israeli businesses continued to operate there in a variety of fields, and recently Israeli companies have become more involved in working on Ghanan infrastructure.

27 Falash Mura Reported To Have AIDS

JERUSALEM — Twenty-seven Falash Mura at the Neveh Carmel caravan site south of Haifa have AIDS, Channel 1's Mabat reported last week.

The Absorption Ministry expressed regret over the report, saying it was aimed at harming the image of the Ethiopian community. It also said there was no basis to reports claiming that most AIDS carriers are Falash Mura. According to a Health Ministry report, less than 0.7 percent of Ethiopians are AIDS carriers, the ministry said in a statement.

Meanwhile, AIDS educator Inon Schenkar announced that an international conference on AIDS prevention and education will be held in Israel in November 1995.

UJA Mission Crosses The Allenby

AMMAN, Jordan — About 100 top donors to the United Jewish Appeal visited Jordan last week, marking the first visit by an American Jewish group since Israel and Jordan last month declared an official end to 46 years of war.

Summing up the sentiments of many on this unprecedented mission, Felicia Weber, a delegation member from Atlanta, said: "To be an eyewitness to history being made, and seeing peace on the horizon, is like being part of a dream."

Participants in the "Prime Minister's Mission" arrived in Jordan following a visit to Morocco, where they met with Moroccan King Hassan.

"Crossing the Allenby Bridge was very historic for me and the leadership of the American Jewish community," said Darell Friedman, president of The Associated: Jewish Community Federation of Baltimore.

JDC Gets Major Response For Rwanda

NEW YORK — The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee received over $300,000 in donations to aid refugees fleeing strife-ridden Rwanda in its first week of fund raising.

The overwhelming response both in volume and sum of contributions surpasses the results of previous "open mailbox" funds, according to JDC spokesman Amir Shaviv.

He attributed the response at least in part to two full-page ads placed by the JDC late last month in The New York Times.

More than 2,500 individual donations have been received from Jews and non-Jews. The largest single contribution was $10,000, made by a Washington law firm.

Weizman Commutes Arab Prison Terms

TEL AVIV — President Ezer Weizman has commuted the prison sentences of eight Palestinian women who were nearing the end of their terms of incarceration for intifada-related incidents that did not include attacks on Jews.

The commutation, which Weizman announced last Tuesday, follows vocal demonstrations to free the women as a confidence-building gesture staged by some Palestinian and Israeli groups.

Aides said the president had deeply pondered the issue, gathering information from legal and security advisers on the crimes for which the women were convicted and their behavior in prison.

Holy Sites Under Israeli Control

JERUSALEM — All the holy places and tourist sites in Judea and Samaria are to remain under Israeli administration until a final arrangement is reached with the Palestinian administration, the Tourism Ministry last week.

The statement followed the completion of negotiations in Cairo on early empowerment of the Palestinian Authority.

Among the sites which are to remain under Israeli administration are the Tomb of the Patriarchs in Hebron, Joseph's Tomb in Nablus and Rachel's Tomb in Bethlehem. The Church of the Nativity is to continue being administered according to the status quo regarding Christian holy places.

All the nature reserves and national parks in the area are also to be under Israeli administration, with the exception of the sites in Jericho which have already been turned over to the Palestinian Autonomy.

Bomb threats in Budapest

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUDAPEST — Hungarian police stepped up security at the headquarters of the Budapest Jewish community and other Hungarian Jewish institutions last week after they received several bomb threats targeting the community center building.

Although the threats proved to be a hoax, police guards remained at their posts near Jewish community buildings, wary of a repetition of the July 18 bombing of the Jewish community headquarters in Buenos Aires that killed more than 100 people and the July 26 bombing of the Israeli Embassy in London.

Those bombings prompted the issuance of a joint declaration of protest by the Zionist Federation, the Hungarian office of the Jewish Agency for Israel and the Eastern European branch of the International Christian Embassy-Jerusalem, a humanitarian aid group with 80 branches worldwide.

The declaration condemned terrorism and called for action against those seeking to torpedo the peace process in the Middle East and the Balkans.

The document stated that "the attacks in Buenos Aires and in London were nothing else but pogroms in a new form — pogroms which were not acts of single, irresponsible individuals or small groups, but were orchestrated by internationally significant organizing forces."

The declaration was presented to the United Nations, the World Jewish Congress, the U.S. Congress and Hungarian President Arpad Goncz.

Johann Fourie, the head of the Christian Embassy-Jerusalem in Budapest, said the declaration prove that Jews and Christians want to act together against terrorism.

A terrorist bomb recently exploded at a large Budapest church on Castle Hill, an imposing height which is the locale of the royal castle, now a museum, and many other tourist sites.

Another explosion shook the Hungarian Parliament in July.

The Hungarian media blamed Serb nationalists for both attacks.

Israel, Jordan to study borders

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Israel and Jordan agreed on last Tuesday to dispatch joint survey teams to demarcate their border according to a 1928 League of Nations' map.

The decision was announced by 50-member negotiating teams after talks at a resort hotel on the Israeli side of the Dead Sea.

The talks on delineating the border, sharing water, airspace rights, security and tourism resumed a day after the two sides inaugurated their first border crossing.

Close to 200 tourists passed through the new Arava border crossing north of Eilat during its first full day of operations on August 9, according to the Airports Authority, which administers Israel's land crossings.

In other negotiations, Israeli and Jordanian officials discussed the location of the Jordanian air corridor over Israel airspace. According to Transport Minister Yisrael Kessar, the corridor is to be situated over the north of the country and not over the Tel Aviv area, as the Jordanians had asked.

Kessar also said that it should only be a short time before Israel is granted permission to fly over Saudia Arabia and the Gulf states, thus enabling El Al to considerably shorten its air route to the Far East.

It was not immediately clear how the decision to use the map by the League of Nations, the precursor of the United Nations, will affect Jordan's claim to more than 350 sq. km (140 sq. m.) of land now held by Israel.

Tel Aviv University Professor Asher Susser, an expert on Jordan, said that going back to the 1928 map — predating both states — was "the only way" to mark the frontier.

He noted that the northern borders of Palestine had been clearly delineated because Britain had a mandate to govern there, while the rival French controlled Syria and Lebanon.

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer FRED M. CATZMAN has been researching their origins over the past few years. Mr. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

GLAZER — SKLAR

You don't need windex to see through the name Glazer and to recognize that it refers to the occupational name Glazier. Less transparent is the Ukrainian equivalent Sklar.

On the other hand, Glazner takes its name from the Village of Glaznow.

PLO official calls for Israel's demise

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — Farouk Kaddoumi, the head of the Palestine Liberation Organization's Tunis-based Foreign Affairs Department, has called for the annihilation of Israel.

Israel's ITIM News Agency quoted a radio address broadcast over a PLO station on August 8 in which Kaddoumi, without mentioning Israel by name, said:

"There is a state which was established through historical force and it must be destroyed. This is the Palestinian way. They seized our land. The refugees must return to their land."

Kaddoumi, a member of the PLO's executive committee, added that the Palestinians would not "give up on one grain of sand of the Palestinian land."

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, who met with PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat in Gaza two days later, lashed out against Kaddoumi's remarks during a joint news conference following the meeting.

"We cannot accept that a senior man in the leadership of the PLO rises up and speaks against the fact of the existence of the State of Israel. It is unthinkable, and if repeated, it will be a serious obstacle to the progress" of negotiations with the PLO, Rabin said.

When Arafat and other members of the ruling Palestinian governing authority recently transferred their headquarters from Tunis to the Gaza Strip and the Jericho enclave in the West Bank, Kaddoumi remained in Tunis.

Under the terms of the declaration of principles signed by Israel and the PLO last September, the Palestinians are barred from establishing direct relations with foreign countries. As a result, the PLO has been maintaining its diplomatic office in Tunis.

For his part, Arafat attempted to play down the significance of Kaddoumi's remarks.

"This is his point of view, not that of the PLO. I am looking into it now," Arafat said.

Vienna's mayor marks his 10th year in office

Helmut Zilk

VIENNA — On the eve of his tenth anniversary in office, the mayor of Vienna, Helmut Zilk, is proud of the role he has played in strengthening Vienna's once large and influential Jewish community.

Decimated by the Nazis, the community has grown to 7,500 registered members, compared to about 166,000 before Germany's annexation of Austria in 1938.

Zilk, who was wounded by a neo-Nazi letter bomb last year, is given credit for helping the community rebuild itself.

Under his mayoralty, the imposing Seitenstettengasse synagogue in central Vienna — which was partly destroyed during Kristallnacht — was restored in 1988, and the Jewish Museum — which was summarily closed by the Nazis — was reopened in 1993.

Building on his predecessors' work, Zilk continues to sponsor an annual Jewish Cultural Week in Vienna in the autumn, a student exchange program which has attracted several hundred Austrians and Israelis in the past decade, and a special program in which former Jewish residents are invited back for a visit.

At Zilk's suggestion, 70,000 Viennese pupils, aged 14-18, were given free passes to see the film Schindler's List.

All in all, Zilk is pleased with the "excellent relations" he enjoys with the community.

And he is gratified — "very happy," as he put it — that Vienna is once again home to a thriving, though truncated, Jewish community.

Although he was not instrumental in its reopening 15 years ago, Zilk went out of his way to voice his pride that Vienna's main Jewish school — the Zwi Perez Chajes Schule — is once again functioning.

Zilk's contributions to the community are widely recognized.

Avshalom Hodik, executive director of the Israelitschen Kultusgemeinde, the community's official body, told The Canadian Jewish News that Zilk is "sympathetic to our community" and has expressed his sentiments in concrete terms.

In the past decade, the municipality of Vienna has given the community $10 million (US) worth of subsidies, Hodik disclosed.

Looking back to the pre-Nazi era, Zilk said that Viennese Jews made an immense contribution to Austria.

"Austrian science, music, literature and medicine (were fortified) by Jews."

Zilk is good friends with a Viennese native son, Teddy Kollek, the former mayor of Jerusalem, who, he said, visits regularly.

Born in 1927, Zilk recalled that many of his father's friends were Jews, and that he himself "grew up with Jewish people."

Vienna, he added, was "a Jewish city." (In fact, 10 per cent of its population was Jewish.) "A lot of people came here from Eastern Europe."

Zilk, who was interviewed in his grand office in City Hall, claimed it was his idea to reopen the Jewish Museum on Dorotheergasse.

Its objectives are three-fold — to preserve Vienna's rich Jewish past; to assist Viennese to come to terms with Austria's Nazi legacy; and to foster cooperation between Christians and Jews.

Last December, Zilk was seriously injured when a letter he was opening at home one Sunday evening exploded. He was rushed to hospital, and in a four-hour operation, three fingers on his left hand were wholly or partly amputated.

Zilk was not the sole victim of neo-Nazi terrorism. Ten other letter bombs were triggered or defused in just a matter of days.

Like Zilk, the intended victims had been prominent in supporting the rights of minorities and immigrants.

Today, Zilk — an animated and jovial man — is fully recovered and feels fine. However, he can no longer use his left hand, and cannot even tie his shoelaces.

But he realizes that he was, relatively speaking, fortunate. "I was lucky," he said, implying that he could have lost the use of his right hand as well.

Since the letter bombing, security in his office has been tightened drastically.

Zilk believes that Austrian laws designed to combat right-wing radicalism are adequate, though he admits this "wasn't always so."

Re-elected mayor in 1987 and again in 1991, Zilk — a graduate of the University of Vienna — was a broadcast and print journalist before entering politics in 1979 as a city councillor.

In 1983, he was appointed federal minister for education and arts. He held that position for about 16 months, and then ran for mayor of Vienna.
